INTRODUCTION.

THE PERSPECTIVE OF AMERICAN LITERATURE.

No critical task is more difficult and delicate than that of estimating the rank and analyzing the achievements of American authors. The student of the classical literature of Greece and Rome finds himself, notwithstanding the controversies of scholars, on well-defined ground, with all of which he can familiarize himself, and on which he can work in accordance with clear laws of criticism, unhindered by contemporary prejudice and error. He who takes up the history of some of the living literatures of the world, such as French, or Spanish, or German, or English, or Italian, can consider, if he will, the literary records of past times alone, not venturing upon dangerous questions affecting living authors. The reader of Russian or Norwegian books, which have, indeed, fewer predecessors in past centuries, has the advantage to be derived from the study of works which are closely related to the life and character of somewhat peculiar and isolated peoples, whose output can advantageously be considered by any contemporary foreigner.

In the case of our own literature the situation is different. In the first place, it may be noted that no language and literature save the English has ever put forth a commanding offshoot without essential change of form and character, and yet existing under peculiar conditions. Dickens can be read with no difficulty on the sand-lots of San Francisco ; and Bret Harte, in turn, is almost our most popular author on the railway stalls of England. The language is practically identical in Britain and America, and the literatures are mutually influential. It is not always easy to say where one begins and the other ends. The English critic feels entirely competent, therefore, to criticise American literature ; and the French or German writer who knows English deems it quite within his province to write on any American theme. And yet this very similarity or identity is confusing and misleading. Wherein our literature really differs from English literature, and wherein it is but a branch bearing the same fruit in a different corner of the inclosure,—these are questions demanding the utmost care on the critic's part.

In considering American literature, therefore, we cannot safely say that the judgment of foreigners is the judgment of posterity. The most intelligent Europeans often make the most startling mistakes concerning literary matters here. Victor Hugo declared, without hesitation, that Poe was "the prince of American literature," and yet, it is said, professed entire ignorance of Emerson's name when it was mentioned to him. Bret Harte, Mark Twain, and other humorists are deemed by many our most characteristic writers, while other critics aver that Joaquin Miller is a truer representative of the life of this country, and still others insist that we really have no American poet save Whitman. The earlier English critics raised Longfellow to a pinnacle of fame ; some later ones dismiss him as "the poet of the commonplace,"—an educated gentleman, who made fair translations and neatly copied foreign models for the home public of the less cultured order. In Longfellow's case, praise has been followed by blame ; but some recent English over-praise of American work—especially in fiction—is scarcely less to be deplored than the former sharp criticisms. Once Sydney Smith made his hackneyed query, John Keats dismissed all American books as worthless, and Southey could find here nothing to praise but Mrs. Brooks' "Zophiel ; or, The Bride of Seven." Now London and Paris and Berlin journals are telling us that our stories are the best in the world, and that this or that new American novel is sure of a prominent place in the literature of the language. We knew that the old denouncers were wrong ; let us not be too sure that the later praisers are right. Both fall into a fatal error of perspective. The first thought that no good thing could come from the American Nazareth, because it was beyond the line of possible productiveness. The last declare, with the French critics, that to tell a story well is the utmost reach of literary endeavor ; or else maintain that no American literature is characteristic which is not new and striking when measured by European standards. In a word, foreign criticism of American literature is, with all its ability, discernment, and appreciation, too often limited in view, bound by the modern fondness for neat fiction-mongering, or dazzled by unfamiliar forms of verse or jest. It does not help us in the matter of literary perspective. We dare not rely upon it for a just description of our works and ways. The critic of American literature should be thoroughly acquainted with both English and American political, social, and literary history; should perceive clearly that in England and America is a dominant and assimilating Saxon folk, working out a similar problem on similar lines; and yet should discriminate between variant conditions, aims, methods, and results. It is not too much to say that no foreign historian of our literature has shown himself possessed of all these qualifications.

In American criticism of American literature, it is surely not less necessary that a true perspective be attained, if possible. How shall it be reached, without much aid from past centuries so far as our point of view is concerned; without material assistance, save in minor matters, from foreign essayists; and with a constantly changing army of writers, quite crowding our literary field, and winning a hurried praise that is soon, perhaps, to change to equally unjust blame?

The point of view of American literature must include living authors. What account of our writers could omit Lowell, Holmes, Whittier, Bancroft, or, indeed, Whitman and James? Could a critic, viewing our literary products in 1876, omit consideration of Bryant, Emerson, and Longfellow? Our literature is practically about eighty years old; any study of it is a study of living writers, in large measure. This necessity is simply to be accepted at the outset. We must read and study books by authors living as well as by authors dead; by those whose best works may be in the future, by those whose methods and achievements may be modified hereafter. We must also recognize the fact that contemporary opinion is sadly fallible, that celebrities are dethroned in the passage of years, and that obscurities are brought into clear and lasting light. Between these two duties it is by no means easy to go. "Incidis in Scyllam, cupiens vitare Charybdim." The Scylla of American literary criticism is the temptation to be prematurely confident that a writer is for all time; the Charybdis is the refusal to praise Lowell and Whittier, where they deserve praise, because they are still alive. Between these rocks the critic too often goes to ruin. Poe struck on both of them; he attacked Longfellow, derided Lowell, and patronized Hawthorne, reserving his praises for writers possessing the prime merit, in his view, of being Southerners or sentimentalists. And yet Poe honestly tried, in his day, to write criticisms which should be unbiased by current verdicts, and should be based on his own investigations. He failed because he lacked the wide learning, the clear insight, and the just temper which the true critic must have.

Applying well-known laws of criticism to the subject in hand, the critic of an American book or author, whether that critic be an American or a foreigner, and whether he be considering past writings or contemporary ones, should try to answer these questions: What did the author aim to do? what method did he adopt? under what conditions did he work? what were his relations to previous writers on this side of the Atlantic? what his debt to English literature? what his obligations to, and his influence upon, his fellow-authors? what his intrinsic success? what his probable rank in the future? In the case of writers no longer living, or in advanced life, he can also ask concerning their influence upon literature here and elsewhere, and the effect of time upon their reputations.

Acting honestly upon this obvious method, and remembering the special environment of American men of letters, and also their heritage in English literature, the critic can properly venture to express an opinion concerning his predecessors and his contemporaries. That he will sometimes fail is unquestionable; but critics of Hebrew or Greek or Roman literature have failed after twenty centuries of accumulated wisdom. Critical failure depends, after all, upon lacks in the critic's standpoint and intellectual equipment, quite as much as upon his place in time, as regards the subjects of his criticism. By him who studiously sets before himself the questions mentioned, conclusions may be reached in an author's lifetime as truly, if not as confidently, as after that author's death. Foolish "patriotism," local pride, the influence of popular enthusiasm and prejudice, resentment of foreign blame, delight at foreign praise,—these things cannot endure in the clear light of true criticism.

It seems necessary to illustrate by examples. Thirty years ago, Washington Irving was still living, honored and read by all, and often placed at the head of our literature. But it was as evident then as now that Irving could do some things and could not do others; that as an essayist he was master of a clear and beautiful style, fairly to be compared with Lamb's, or even with Addison's; that the "Sketch-Book" was not likely to lose its place among classic English works; that Irving was a genuine humorist, though sometimes coarse or tiresome; that he could tell a story gracefully; that the "Life of Washington" was not likely to be superseded, but might be; and that, as biographer and historian, Irving failed because he lacked familiarity with the sounder and deeper method. The critic in 1854, then, might safely say, as he does to-day, that Irving stands in the fore-front of American literature, but not at the head of our prose-writers. The debt of American literature to the man who first gave us a European reputation in letters was as binding and as apparent then as now. Turning to others composing what the late J. R. Dennett called the "Knickerbocker School," could not a discerning student perceive, fifty years ago, that Paulding's writings bore no promise of lasting renown; that Drake, a poet clearly of a third-rate order, had, nevertheless, proved that poetry pure and simple could be written here; and that Halleck's two lyrics would always give him a good place in the anthologies, while his doggerel humor and his "fine writing" would go the way of all similar productions?

The same foresight could have been applied to our early poetry. It was Bryant's good fortune, which he sometimes resented, to write his most popular poem in early youth. I think his sagest readers felt it in 1817, as they do now, that "Thanatopsis" is one of the best modern pieces in blank verse—the most difficult of metres; that its tone and expression are high, and true so far as they go; and that its defects are of a negative order. When Bryant was fifty years old he had proved that he was sometimes as good a poet as Wordsworth, but that he could by no means attain to Wordsworth's serenest heights. To have claimed for Bryant the highest place in our poetry would have been idle; for he lacked fire, breadth of view, wide sympathy with human nature, and what Hawthorne, speaking of Jones Very, called "a sense of the ludicrous." What could have been claimed for him, is now paid him as his due: the rank of a poet of lofty thought, austere mind, and commanding expression in his own field. Longfellow came, in his early life, to that position which he is not likely to lose,—the place of the poet of sympathy and feeling. Careful readers knew, in the days of "Souvenirs" and "Keepsakes," as they know now, that Longfellow's poems would endure, while time would bury the writings of N. P. Willis, and Mrs. Osgood, and "Maria del Occidente," and the rest who tried to succeed in the same work. When Longfellow showed what could be done in hexameter and trochaic tetrameter, gave us our nearest approach to an American epic, and chronicled old Acadian and New England days in fit verse, he proved that the spirit of poetry could find native themes, and could put them into new forms on this side the water. There has been no time since Longfellow began to write when his position has not been secure ; and it is not now, as it has not been in the past, jeopardized by his occasional flatness, prosiness, and prolixity. Emerson, in old age, said that he could not read all Longfellow wrote,—he “ wrote too much ” ; but the same Emerson, at Longfellow’s funeral, remembered him as a “ sweet and noble soul,” though the dying sage had forgotten the very name of the dead singer. The critic may admit Longfellow’s faults ; but many an orphic, or intense, or cosmic, or Browningsque poet may well envy Longfellow’s fame. It needs no future century to point out both the faults and the fame. The same may be said of Poe. If we go to Poe for what he cannot furnish, we shall be disappointed. He has no answer to life’s problems, no help for life’s struggle, no strong conception of ethics or faith ; he merely gives us weird fancies and sweetly melodious music, at times rising, as in “ Annabel Lee ” and “ To One in Paradise,” to half-religious heights. He is not the “ prince of American literature,” for princes govern as well as dazzle ; but he is one of the world’s men of genius. Will all this be more evident, or less, a century hence ?

It seems to me that the value and the substantial accuracy of contemporary criticism of the higher order have been illustrated in the case of Emerson. There was not a little that was extravagant, or ephemeral, or valueless, or broadly farcical, in the Transcendental movement of 1840. But even in the midst of that period of "storm and stress," and of simmer and sputter, Emerson saw the follies of his associates, and avoided the most glaring of them, while Hawthorne, on a serener height of common-sense, perceived Emerson's mistakes. As the years have gone by, intelligent critics estimate Emerson with substantial fairness. The period of adulation has not yet passed, it is true ; but, after all, do we not know what Emerson was and was not, what he did and could not do, and what is the essential value of his prose and of his verse? Emerson the optimist, the stimulating force, the developer of the individual, the deep and true poet, the seer, we know and feel ; and yet we can see not the less clearly his inconsistencies, his inferiority to Carlyle in Hebrew-like sense of Jehovah's might, his obscurities of style, his real narrowness of view when he renounced all religious forms. On the whole, the sager contemporary readers know and judge Emerson, Thoreau, Alcott, Margaret Fuller, as they ought to be known and judged.

That there is a difficulty in criticising, during the authors' lifetime, the works of such winsome personalities as Whittier and Holmes, is unquestionable. But is it too soon to say that Whittier, at his best, is high and noble ; or that "Snow-Bound" is a characteristic descriptive poem of New England, and seems sure to live? No recognition of his bad rhymes, incorrect pronunciations, or occasional tediousness and thinness need hinder such an expression of opinion. And Holmes and Lowell know in what they have succeeded and in what failed ; in the works of the latter the merits and demerits are so plain, that if the reader were to take his Lowell from the shelf, and mark these merits and demerits, from the first page to the last, from the Tennysonian echoes to "The Cathedral" and the "Commemoration Ode," I have no doubt that their writer would substantially agree with the criticisms made.

I need not speak here of other poets. In the case of Whitman, there is, of course, no agreement as yet. When one critic regards him as a Homer-Shakespeare, with improvements, and another deems him an impostor in the garb of a poet, it is not easy to make a compromise. Much contemporary criticism of Whitman, whether praise or blame, is valueless. The poet arouses undue adulation and unjust contempt. Certainly, however, we may claim that the criticism of Whitman by the best American minds is likely to be approved by the literary historians of the future, in comparison with that expressed by not a few foreigners of high intelligence. In regard to the perspective of American literature, it must never be forgotten that deck-hands, 'longshoremen, and stage-drivers, Californian miners, Chinese, highway robbers, buffaloes, and Indians are but a part of our civilization, and that literature may concern itself with such themes as God, duty, culture, and Eastern lakes or rivers, and still be distinctively American.

A German gentleman, an intelligent reader, for many years a resident of Boston, once expressed to me the opinion that Hawthorne is, perhaps, the greatest writer of this century, and that our historians are the equals of any who have written in Europe;

beyond this he was hardly ready to make many claims for our literature. I substantially agree with him in these expressions, though I would not stop with them. It is true, however, that American literature should stand firmly on its own ground, making no claims on the score of patriotism, or youth, or disadvantageous circumstances, or bizarre achievement, but gravely pointing to what has been done. It is better to offer to the world, self-respectingly and silently, Emerson, Longfellow, Motley, Bancroft, Irving, Ticknor, Poe, and Hawthorne, in their several works and ways. These stand for themselves; their place is assured, and we have no need to assert their claims with vociferousness or exaggeration.

If honest, searching, and dispassionate criticism of American literature is needed in considering the work and rank of authors of the present century,—who have chiefly given that literature its place in the world's estimation,—it is no less needed in studying our writers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. American literature in the colonial period was in its day of small things, promising indeed, but without great achievement. No small honor is to be paid, of course, to the pioneer in any department of work. It was, in a true sense, harder for Mrs. Bradstreet to be Mrs. Bradstreet than for Emerson to be Emerson. The Puritans of Massachusetts Bay were the direct precursors and the actual founders of most that is good in American letters. Those theological treatises and controversial sermons, those painstaking versions of the Psalms, and those faithful records of sight and experience were the index-fingers pointing to future triumphs. Bradford and Winthrop were the intellectual ancestors of Emerson and Hawthorne. Cotton Mather and Jonathan Edwards were giants in their day. Benjamin Franklin still remains one of the world's great helpful forces. Jefferson and the writers of the "Federalist" made great contributions to the political wisdom of the nations. But when all this has been said, does it not remain true that some critics have bestowed an unwarrantable amount of time and thought and adulation upon writers of humble rank and small influence, simply because they were early? John Smith, temporarily in America, wrote accounts of American scenes and peoples,—accounts more entertaining than trustworthy; he must be mentioned, but is he, therefore, our first writer? When there is a Central African literature in English, will Henry M. Stanley be reckoned one of its early lights? George Sandys translated Ovid in Virginia, and William Morrell made Latin verses in Massachusetts, both returning to the mother country; how did their experience and writings differ from those of other temporary residents in other foreign lands? English literature, from 1607 to 1776, passed from one brilliant period to another; the American colonies were in constant intellectual and personal communication with the old home. If we think of Shakespeare, Bunyan, Milton, the seventeenth-century choir of lyrists, Sir Thomas Browne, Jeremy Taylor, Addison, Swift, Dryden, Gray, Goldsmith, and the eighteenth-century novelists, what shall we say of the intrinsic literary worth of most of the books written on American soil, by writers who inherited, or shared, the intellectual life of England?

In other words, why should writings which would have passed into obscurity in England be magnified beyond their deserts, merely because they were written on the American coast? We may be interested, as antiquarians, in the poor verses of Anne Bradstreet, Nathaniel Ward, Peter Folger, Michael Wigglesworth, and the Bay Psalmists; we may recognize the intellectual force of Richard and Increase Mather and Roger Williams; and we may laboriously describe the hundreds of sermons, the scores of treatises, the dozens of books of verse, which were printed by colonial writers; but we cannot eulogize them at length without a sad distortion of perspective. A few great names stand out, but only a few. For the purposes of comparative criticism, the student should know thoroughly William Bradford, John Winthrop, Samuel Sewall, Cotton Mather, Jonathan Edwards, Benjamin Franklin, and the makers of the new nation from 1750 to 1790. The work of the rest he should recognize and praise in an adequate degree, but should not magnify beyond its deserts. The history of literature is one thing, bibliography is quite another thing. If a certain space be devoted to the colonial literature of America, then, on the same perspective, ten times as much is needed to bring the record down to our day. One should study the great men profoundly, and let the worthy sermonizers, and pamphleteers, and spinners of doggerel go free. Our forefathers were founding a state on the basis of the town-meeting; they were spreading Christianity, as they understood it, with might and main; they were opening schools and creating a virtuous and manly public spirit; but for literature, as such, most of them cared little. They made literature possible, just as they made art possible; but they do not deserve, in the chronicles of literature and art, a disproportionate space.

I believe that the time has come for the student to consider American literature as calmly as he would consider the literature of another country, and under the same limitations of perspective. Some things we have not done at all; some we have done ill, some passably well, and some better than any other nation in the world. We can afford to recognize this fact and act upon it. Let us no longer praise an author because he is American, or because his booklet was printed in Boston or New York instead of London or Paris. We can afford to be self-respecting. It is the new city, the shoddy family, the growing literature, that is self-assertive. Hawthorne, Emerson, Longfellow, Motley, are all well able to take care of their own reputations. The development of Hawthorne's genius is to be studied as impartially as we study Dante, and in the same quiet way. And let us not give to John Norton, or Samuel Penhallow, or Mather Byles, or Robert Calef, or Nathaniel Morton, or Percival, or Mrs. Sigourney, time and thought which belong to greater and more lasting names.

Expository criticism of American literature must give way to philosophical criticism. Compendiums and guides and selections have had their work to do. Faithful workers have hunted up, set in order, and described the older American books. We have had enough description; we want analysis. What has been and what is the environment of our literature? What have been the relations between cause and effect, between the Saxon mind in England and the Saxon mind in America? What have American writers thus far done, worthy to be mentioned beside Goethe, Schiller, Hugo, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Carlyle, George Eliot, and all the great writers of this and previous centuries? What of our books are world's-books, and why? How and why have American writers succeeded and failed?

The pages which follow—imperfect in execution, but not, I hope, wholly false in method—are a modest endeavor to aid readers in answering these questions.

CHAPTER I.

THE RACE-ELEMENTS IN AMERICAN LITERATURE.

LITERATURE is the written record of valuable thought, having other than merely practical purpose. Behind literature is race ; behind race, climate and environment. The history of American literature is the history of the literature of a part of the English people, under new geographical and political conditions, within the present limits of the United States.

The predecessors of the English in America left unimportant literary remains. The earliest known occupants of the soil,—the people commonly called Mound-Builders, perhaps the ancestors of the North American Indians,*—whose mysterious life is now in some degree made known to us by mounds, exhumed implements and ornaments, died without leaving any written records. They built homes, tilled the soil, worked mines, and reached a civilization higher in some ways than that of their less numerous descendants, the Indian tribes of modern history ; but upon American literature they had no influence, and their life in Central and Eastern North

* "Prehistoric America," by the Marquis de Nadaillac. Translated by N. d'Anvers ; edited by W. H. Dall. New York : G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1884.

America is not celebrated by way of memory, even, in any commanding literary production of their last successors. "They had no poet, and they died."

The life of the North American Indians has been closely connected with the life of the English colonists in the New World, and therefore with their books of travel and history, their poems, and their novels.

The first settlers found the Indians on American shores and in American woods; the very existence of the white men was jeopardized by their presence; and the personal and race characteristics of the red men became not only subjects for future romance and song, but matters of grim and direct everyday concern. To this day the Indians, possibly as numerous as in 1607, stand on the outskirts of Caucasian civilization in North America, a problem and a menace, a theme for literature, and a subject for moral and industrial reform.

But "aboriginal American literature," as it has been ambitiously termed, bears to the literature of the United States a far less important relation than Celtic literature bears to English. There is, to be sure, a scanty Indian literature, but it has been an influence rather than an entity; and it deserves mention, in a history of American intellectual progress, as an influence merely. The student of pure literature concerns himself with Longfellow's Hia-watha—the nearest approach to an American epic—or with the novels of Fenimore Cooper, rather than with the remains of Indian eloquence or the paraphrases of Indian verse. Frequent episodes in the history of the United States prove, to be sure, that Indian oratory sometimes possesses force, or even sublimity ; that it may unite poetical thought with bold strength of utterance ; and that measured by one rhetorical test, that of its effect upon a somewhat unimpressible and dogged race, it is not undeserving of study by the speakers of other languages. But here, as in poetry, the Indian race has not been one which has created or preserved a literature, in any large sense, whether by wandering minstrels, by rehearsers of national legends, by picture-writing, or by written words. The materials of literature have been about the race, in nature and life, but these materials have lacked the shaping force of an indigenous culture.

Much, indeed, must be said of the Indian, in studying the works of American writers ; in the early narratives of colonization, unimportant as literature but interesting as history, he fills a large place ; and in the pages of the two authors just mentioned, his picture stands out prominently, known and examined in many lands. Reserving for a future volume of this work the consideration of other matters concerning this interesting race, it may be said at the outset that two utterly variant presentations of Indian character have been prevalent in America, the second of which has chiefly influenced American literature.

Indian

In the first place, it has been maintained by many who have been directly familiar with the Indians in daily life, that they are cruel, vindictive, and treacherous ; incapable of civilization ; and worthy only of extermination in war or rigorous suppression in peace. No more candid presentation of this view can be found than in the following words of General George A. Custer, a brave fighter in the Indian wars, who finally lost his life at the hands of those whom he so sternly describes :

My firm conviction, based upon an intimate and thorough analysis of the habits of character and natural instinct of the Indian, and strengthened and supported by the almost unanimous opinion of all persons who have made the Indian problem a study, and have studied it not from a distance, but in immediate contact with all the facts bearing thereupon, is, that the Indian cannot be elevated to that great level where he can be induced to adopt any policy or mode of life varying from those to which he has ever been accustomed, by any method of teaching, argument, reasoning, or coaxing, which is not preceded and followed closely in reserve by a superior physical force. In other words, the Indian is capable of recognizing no controlling influence but that of stern, arbitrary power.*

Many other observers, with an equally good right to speak, and of a mental habit more teachable and less excitable than General Custer's, have reached the contrary conclusion.† They have recognized the fact that the elevation and education of the Indian must be a slow process ; but they have felt that he is capable both of education and of civilization ; that he is less ungrateful than the Englishmen and Americans who have so often abused him ; and that, whatever his present condition, his character has been lowered by long maltreatment and unrequited wrong. “ Do we of the present day really know the Indian character at all? As well say we know the beauty of a grand old forest because we have seen the stumps and dead leaves that mark the place where once it stood.” *

* The Galaxy [magazine], New York, January, 1873.

† Gen. George Crook, a successful campaigner against the Indians, put on record in 1884 his belief that there was not in the State of Pennsylvania a town, of similar size, having a population more peaceful and law-abiding than the five thousand Apaches on the San Carlos reservation. Under Gen. Crook, whom these naturally fierce Indians respected, they made considerable progress in agriculture and civilized methods of living.

Leaving to the ethnologist and the philanthropist the further discussion of the Indian's character, we need do no more, at the outset of this history, than to present a few specimens of his intellectual output, chosen as most characteristic after examination of a large number. These specimens, whose genuineness is at least sufficiently established to warrant their introduction here as illustrations of the powers of Indian intellect, serve to show why the colonists in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries wrote books for the aborigines, as well as about them, and thought it worth while to found colleges and schools for their benefit. They also show why American poets and novelists, in later days, have deemed the Indian worth more than an angry or contemptuous chronicle in their pages.

An Algonquin traditionary account of the Creation, first partially recorded in picture-writing, then reduced to parallel verses in the Delaware dialect, and finally paraphrased in English, is as follows :

Some of the Indian love-songs possess beauty of the sort displayed in the following :

My love is tall and graceful as the young pine waving on the hill, and as swift in his course as the noble, stately deer ; his hair is flowing, and dark as the blackbird that floats through the air, and his eyes, like the eagle's, both piercing and bright ; his heart, it is fearless and great, and his arm, it is strong in the fight, as this bow made of iron-wood which he easily bends. His aim is as sure in the fight and chase, as the hawk, which ne'er misses its prey. Ah, aid me, ye spirits ! of water, of earth, and of sky, while I sing in his praise ; and my voice shall be heard, it shall ring through the sky ; and echo, repeating the same, shall cause it to swell in the breath of the wind ; and his fame shall be spread throughout the land, and his name shall be known beyond the lakes.*

Inferior to this is the following Chippeway love-song, in which a special-pleader critic has fancied he has found cumulative force :

I will walk into somebody's dwelling,
Into somebody's dwelling will I walk.

To thy dwelling, my dearly beloved,
Some night will I walk, will I walk.

A previous version of this record—of which I have quoted only the opening section—was given in "Historical and Mythological Traditions of the Algonquins, with a translation of the Walum-Olum, or bark record of the Lenni-Lenape," by E. G. Squier ; read before the New York Historical Society, June, 1848 ; printed in The American Whig Review, New York, February, 1849 ; reprinted in The Indian Miscellany, edited by W. W. In this brief hymn much is said in few words:

Ever let piety (or prayer)
Be the rule of our lives ;
The Great Spirit alone, Alone let us love.

All evil living of mankind,
All, all that 's bad or weak ;
All evil living,—as a tainted wind,—
All, let us all forsake.†

Mr. Charles Godfrey Leland has collected some of the oral traditions of the Passamaquoddy and Penobscot tribes in Maine, and the Micmacs in New Brunswick. In "The Story of The Three Strong Men," a Micmac tale of enchantment, occurs this wife-song :

There are many men in the world,
But only one is dear to me.
He is good, and brave, and strong.
He swore to love none but me ;
He has forgotten me.
It was a bad spirit that changed him,
But I will love none but him.‡

The physical, mental, and spiritual characteristics of the Saxons need no long description. We find them, in their crudest state, portrayed with unmistakable fidelity in the pages of Tacitus, the greatest Roman writer of philosophic history; and no less clearly presented in the record of civilization for nineteen Christian centuries. The scholar and the world are equally well acquainted with the Saxons' strong bodies and strong appetites; their resolute courage in fighting wind and sea, fog and cold; their excesses in gluttony and drunkenness; their love of home and children; their stern and undemonstrative temper, kindled most by patriotism and family affection; their Hebraic belief in the one, awful, vengeance-repaying Power; their equally strong belief in the responsibility and the possibilities of the individual man; and their capability of adapting themselves to new circumstances, and of assimilating such foreign elements as may come into their way. Teutons, with these characteristics, pass from the Continent to Britain in the fifth century, and from Britain to America in the seventeenth; little by little they crowd their predecessors backward and downward, or shape them into new forms, until of the five great nations of the world, at the close of the nineteenth century, three are Teutonic—akin in race, in speech, and in general attitude toward religion and social progress. Two of these three nations read each other's books and periodicals, have a constant interchange of material and intellectual goods, and are in essentials but a single folk.*

* "I will say that one idea has been strongly impressed upon me, and that is the belief that the peoples of America and England are really iden-

For years the first settlers in New England and Virginia were like Englishmen making a long visit in a foreign country. They came from a fully matured nation, and had no idea of giving up relations with those whom they had left, or of forming a new nation for themselves. Their separation from home characteristics and influences, and their purposes for the future, did not in all respects resemble the wider separation and the strictly selfish purposes of the Saxon settlers in Celtic Britain. The Saxons left all behind them, in an age of infrequent communication between land and land; the Englishmen in America were ever watching the lessening sails of the homeward bark, and eagerly welcoming those newly come from their ancestral villages beyond the sea. In New England, to be sure, the colonists were possessed by a profound religious purpose, at variance with that prevailing at home; but nevertheless they brought with them, and applied to the development of this purpose, every race-characteristic of the Englishmen of the times of James I. They planned to found colonies of the English nation, and of course had a firm belief in the general utility of English institutions, social customs, laws, education, and family management. Their village-idea, all important in the development of the new country, was the Saxon one. Everywhere they adapted, but they seldom created. And after two centuries and a half, tical in character. We have our special difficulties at home, and you have yours here; but the people of the two countries are really the same at bottom. the Englishman who comes to America finds the race unchanged in all important matters, and feels that change and development and growth—or lack of development and growth, if he so call it—have not destroyed or concealed the race-type and the race-work.*

New England, in 1620 and the following years, was thus settled mainly by people of pure English stock, and the Pilgrims of Plymouth and the Puritans of Massachusetts Bay, whatever their small differences at first, were at one in their firm religious purpose. Two types of Christians have Pilgrims and Puritans in New England. ever been found in the churches; and, indeed, these two types may be noted in the number of those who associated with, or directly followed, Christ himself. The first consists of those whose struggles with temptation and sin are aided by times and seasons, by cathedrals and cloisters, by vestments and ceremonies, by prayer-books and church calendars; the second consists of those who, like the eagle, look upon the strongest sunlight with undazzled eye,—who, upon the lonely heights of spiritual exaltation, or in the depths of virtually pessimistic self-abasement, commune directly with Jehovah, scorning all human help. The two classes must exist until the end of time; either may run toward religious excesses, but both contain germs of good, and have nobly contributed to the world's civilization. In the early part of the seventeenth century the ritual class had the upper hand in England, therefore no small portion of the independents founded a New England, upon the basis of the social institutions of the old island, as modified by a somewhat narrow but terribly earnest theocratic idea. They carried out the principles of Wycliffe, Tyndale, Luther, Calvin, Latimer; but insisted upon viewing the words of these masters, even, in the light of their own interpretation of the Bible itself. They lived in New England as those holding a corner of the world for God and righteousness, as measured by themselves; against prelates, papists, Baptists, Quakers, and heathen. The ballot was in the hands of the freeman, but the freeman was the church-member, and the church-member was subject to the government of the local church. They gave up lesser pleasures for the great inward joy of self-surrender to the right, as they understood it. They likened themselves, not without reason, to the children of Israel in the wilderness; and in them the half-Hebraic temper of the Christianized Saxons appeared in full. The individual before his God—such was the Pilgrim or Puritan of Plymouth, Salem, and Boston. The mistakes and the triumphs of these brave and self-reliant settlers lie at the very root of the intellectual life of New England for two centuries and a half. They made the American nation and American literature possible. Without William Bradford and John Winthrop, as I have said before, we could not have had Emerson and Hawthorne. Their very limitations, the narrow lines upon which their desperate earnestness worked, made them the best of pioneers. If they failed to develop the fullest manhood, they avoided the dangers of half-belief and of loose morals, most destructive at the outset of any colonial history. They were Old-Testament Christians.

* “In the few days which I have as yet spent in the third England, it is the likeness, not the unlikeness, to the second England which strikes me. I have often to go through a distinct process of thought to remind myself that I am in New England, and not in middle England still.”—EDWARD A. FREEMAN; lecture in New York, Feb. 11, 1882.

It seems almost an anomaly to aver that the Massachusetts colonists were exceptionally favored in their opportunities for a peaceful working out of a religious, political, and social problem, with its inevitable intellectual corollary. It is true that during the seventeenth century the horrors or dangers ^{Early Liberty in New England.} of Indian warfare constantly kept within sight; the colonists' meeting-houses were military posts; the men carried guns to the place of worship, and were in constant readiness to transmute spiritual warfare into earthly conflict. But not often have religious theorizers had so good an opportunity to put principles into practice. The early New Englanders were untrammelled by dominant customs, by political machinery, or by the menace of domestic or foreign war. The battles of King Philip's war made less local disturbance for them than did Marston Moor for old England. Statecraft and politics were in the hands of the American Puritans in a sense by no means true in the case of their fellow-sympathizers under Cromwell. In considering the intellectual and political history of America, too much stress can hardly be laid upon the independence possessed by the New England colonists from the first. They desired to erect a Congregational theocracy on new soil; to regulate major and minor morals according to their conception of duty and revealed truth ; and to spread an idea of Christianity substantially that of Calvin, as interpreted by them. The remarkable freedom with which they were enabled to do this, for a century and a half, is easily to be explained. The policy of the home government was pretty steadily a commercial one. The better class of English statesmen, whether Whig or Tory, were satisfied to let American fanatics manage religion as they chose, provided fields were tilled, houses multiplied, and wharves stretched toward England. British politicians did not care to insist on the exportation of prevalent British theology, so long as the Puritans bought a fair share of London goods at high prices, and built up recruiting stations for the national trade. This fact the Puritans well recognized ; the pages of Bradford and Winthrop prove that they knew when to be discreet toward London, as well as when to be bitter toward prelacy. Church law, civil enactment, conditions of suffrage, free choice of their immediate rulers—these things the colonists held within their own power. The village community, with the church as its centre, never has had a fuller exemplification than in the Massachusetts and Connecticut of 1620-1640. Out of that community legitimately grew the New England Confederation, a precursor of the Nation of 1776.

Personal liberty, in politics and religion, was of course not generally secured in the American colonies at first. The Baptist must go from Massachusetts Bay to Providence Plantations, and the Boston Friend must fly hither and yon ; while the Protestant was under social ban in Maryland, and the Roman Catholic and the Puritan were similarly troubled in Virginia. But if the average liberty of modern America did not then exist anywhere, we must remember that liberty, as defined by John Stuart Mill, is even yet rather ideal than actual. Puritans, Anglicans, and Roman Catholics, on American soil, all failed to solve the problem of individual freedom, but, like Luther and Calvin, they set the ball in motion, and could not stop it when they would. Or, to change the figure for the sake of an apt phrase, Puritan and Presbyterian, Friend, Catholic, and Episcopalian, "builted better than they knew." Any rigorous state church was out of the question. If the Puritans, by permission or by purchase, had the right to regulate religion and local politics under a distant, but real, king or parliament, no line of true reasoning could lead to a denial of similar rights to others under similar circumstances. And if they founded an aristocracy rather than a democracy, an oligarchy, not a commune, let us remember that not all republican thinkers, in wiser days, follow their convictions to a merely theoretical conclusion. Sour, bigoted, and wicked as some of them were, having faith and hope but no charity, they made a great future possible. Their mistakes on Witch Hill and Boston Common must not blind our eyes to the inherent justice and necessary triumph of their general purpose. Roger Williams and his Baptist colony in Rhode Island but dared to carry one step further that for which the Puritans themselves were really fighting—the idea of man's government by conscience, and of non-hierarchical interpretation of Scripture.

Unlovely indeed does the Puritans' intolerance appear beside Williams' liberality, or the Friends' "inner light," or the placidity of the Dutch in New York, or Lord Baltimore's discreet toleration in Maryland, or even the laissez-faire in North Carolina and Georgia. But the just historian, in striking the balance, cannot forget Episcopal persecutions of Puritans in Virginia and South Carolina, aggravating indiscretions on the part of Baptists and Friends in Massachusetts, stolid avarice on the banks of the Hudson, and apparent insincerity in Maryland. Saints and sinners struggled on American soil, but the result was for the optimist and not the pessimist. The United States, like every other Teutonic nation, works through the individual on moral lines; hence its salvation, after manifold errors and sins.

What, then, was the background of the nascent American literature in Puritan New England, in the seventeenth century? An intense and ever-present religious purpose, a grim confidence in the powers of devout Man, and a determination to secure the rights, individual and collective, of the Puritan communities. To these was added an instant resolution, never lost, that a learned ministry should be secured, and that education should be readily accessible. Many of the Puritan leaders were men of social position and of considerable wealth; some were graduates of Cambridge University. Their intellectual and social sanity kept them aloof from the excesses of the half-crazed fanatics who hung upon the edge of the anti-prelatical party in England. Law, as they interpreted it, was supreme; and they recognized clearly that law and progress depend alike upon sound mental training. They were not ready to go so far as did Milton toward "pagan" or continental culture, but books and study, the printing-press, and the didactic sermon, they kept at the front. William Brewster, of Plymouth, had printed in Leyden, in 1617—three years before the landing on Plymouth Rock—a quarto of 184 pages, a Dutch translation of Dod and Cleaver's "Short Catechism on the Ten Commandments"; and this anticipation of the work of the Cambridge and Boston printers shows that the Massachusetts fondness for doctrinal writing and printing had existed before the westward voyage. Catechism-making is not literary work of the highest class, and it is no matter for literary congratulation that the most popular of many catechisms by New England ministers was that famous book first issued in England, and reprinted in Cambridge in 1656, entitled: "Spiritual Milk for BOSTON BABES in either England. Drawn out of the Breasts of both Testaments for their Souls' Nourishment. But may be of like use to any Children. By John Cotton, B.D., late Teacher to the Church of Boston in New England." This work was often re-issued, and was called by Cotton Mather, half a century later, "peculiarly the catechism of New England"; to which words Mather added that it would "be valued, and studied, and improved, until New England cease to be New England." Readers of "The New England Primer," in which it was included, are familiar with it; and the booklet, with its grotesque biblicopoetical title, may serve as an illustration of the way in which early Massachusetts made literature—such as it was—the “handmaid of religion.” Godliness was the thing ever borne in mind by father, mother, child. So long as books promoted godliness, or at least did not interfere with it, they were permitted, and even encouraged; but it should be clearly stated that most of those who put pen to paper in early New England had religious, and not literary, purposes in view.

As the Bible was the radiating point of literature, so the “meeting-house” was the centre of the intellectual life of the community. The Bible and the Meeting-house. The plain, rectangular building was neither warmed nor lighted, save by the “meeting-house windows blank and bare”; for stoves were considered superfluous luxuries, and “evening meetings” semi-sandalous. Sermons and prayers were both long and deep, and from both the whole village derived sturdiness and strength for its life-work during the ensuing week. In a true sense the first church of Christ in Boston was Boston, in the early and shaping years of the growing town; and so was the first church in Plymouth, Dorchester, Salem, and the other villages of the coast. The ministers taught the people, and of the ministers the governors took counsel. “How shall the ministers be maintained?” was the first question considered by the first general court. Nearly all the residents of any town were members of the church, and, as has been said, none was considered a freeman until he became a church-member. But within these church limits all were equal. They recognized no bishop of the "apostolic succession," able "to impart a supernatural efficacy to language, water, bread, and wine"; they believed each local church responsible to Christ alone, and bound to neighboring churches only by bonds of charity and discretion and common belief; they held the Bible to be the final and all-inclusive authority; and they spurned liturgies, church-days, and ecclesiastical forms in general. Scrupulous fidelity was observed in following the directions contained in Matthew xviii., 15-17, and it cannot be doubted that an honest endeavor was made to live as Christians ought.* The generally accepted creed was a minutely complete "scheme" of salvation, describing the nature of God and man as if both were capable of presentation in a "sun-clear statement," and as though the laws of speculative theology were as fixed as those of the natural world. This creed must be accepted in its entirety, and disagreement in one point was only less serious than the abandonment of all. The

* "The Puritans were concerned to identify their system with only one stage of antiquity, and that one, as they fully believed, at least one generation back of the starting-point of the prelatical system. It may be stoutly affirmed that if ever an intelligent, scholarly, and earnest body of men, with profound religious purposes to move them, were engaged in any work in the results of which they found full satisfaction, such a work, and so endeavored, was that of the Puritans, when with patient study, singleness of aim, and persistent prayer, they sought to revive, to reconstruct, and then strictly in every feature and element to adopt, the mode of church institution and discipline which they found in the New Testament Scriptures as those of the first Christian disciples and assemblies."—REV. DR. GEORGE E. ELLIS, introduction to Arthur B. Ellis' "History of the First Church in Boston," 1630-1880. Boston, 1882.

No task is easier than to present a picture of the spiritual tyranny administered in church, social life, and home, by these theoretical believers in freedom. The aged were not too venerable, nor was the prattling child too feeble, to escape its implacable machinery. But it was a religious system of honesty and downright integrity. Its authors made no attempt to exempt themselves from its operations. Great and small, high and low, famous and obscure,—all were on the same footing before God and man. The system was Puritan, but because it was Puritan it was Miltonic; it could not stop short, though it would, of full spiritual and political freedom. Its last support was the integrity of mind and conscience; and upon this support its ultimate success was sure. The Puritans of New England were men of faith, and their faith has removed mountains of error. “The faith of the New England Puritan, while debasing him before the Lord, gave him virtue to stand before tyrants. From the beginning, their religion, their manner of life, the wilderness which they were compelled to conquer, the institutions which they established and maintained, were preparing the colonists to become the founders of the mightiest empire of self-governed men that the world has seen. And during the whole course of colonial history, the meeting-house—the house for the town-meeting as well as for the worship of God—was the central hearth of light and warmth for the little world of each community.” *

* Charles Eliot Norton's address at the 200th anniversary [1881] of the building of the meeting-house at Hingham, Mass.

It was therefore of small moment that in the Puritan meeting-house, and in the Puritan life of which that meeting-house was the centre, there was little of graciousness or outward charm. There were no symbols but creed-symbols, no flower-gardens of the soul, such as Sir Thomas Browne or even Milton walked in; and though the Puritans were formalists in spite of themselves, they took pains to eliminate all art from their worship and all frivolity from their "walk and conversation." Their religion was a joy forever, but it certainly was not a thing of beauty, so far as externals went. The worshippers were poor in worldly goods, poor in the æsthetics of life, and yet rich in hope, faithful in industry, indomitable in courage, trustful in Providence. They did not know how to laugh, but they were equally ignorant of fretting or grumbling. So far as their records have come down to us, they neither felt nor expressed any pleasure in nature. The world was "lost," and so they made no attempt to find any beauty in it. Flowers bloomed and birds sang, while even joyous human nature asserted itself now and then, as in a few of the verses of Anne Bradstreet or in a stray word in a sermon, but not at first. Life was too serious a thing to be frittered away, or sung away, or rusted away; therefore it was either worn out in godly industry or eaten up by the acid of the prevailing doctrine. But duty was done constantly and unrepiningly; and nothing but duty could have made possible that great and potent factor in the world's civilization, the New England of the past two hundred and fifty years.

The Weakness and the Strength of Puritanism.

The original colonists within the present limits of the United States have formed a nucleus around which have gathered—chiefly in the North and West—emigrants from every European nation, and from Asia, not to speak of the great African population due to the former existence of slavery on American soil. Irish abound in the New England and Middle states, Germans in the Middle and Western states, Scandinavians in the Northwest, and French Canadians along the northern border. But the characteristics of the first English settlers remain strongly marked upon the composite people, and the American Irishman, or German, or Frenchman, notwithstanding his love for fatherland, soon loses somewhat of his former nature, under the potent influence of new conditions and of the dominant Saxon temper. The Dutchmen, Frenchmen, Spaniards, and Swedes, who formerly controlled parts of the United States, have left their mark upon local institutions, habits, and dialects; but all the non-English folk have little affected the literature of the country. The study of their past and future in America belongs to the social historian, not to the literary recorder.

The seeds of American literature were most effectively sown in New England, but its growth has been subject to complex influences in other parts of the country—influences sometimes favorable and sometimes injurious. Thus the numbers and power of the Dutch in New York, the Swedes in Delaware, and even the English Friends in Pennsylvania, acted at first as a hindrance to a literature necessarily English, and in intellectual sympathy with prevalent English ideas. But Dutchman, Friend and Swede made contributions of solidity of character, business thrift, rectitude of purpose, or political sturdiness, to the foundations of the literature that was to be; while all elements in the colonies were unconsciously building up a cosmopolitan nature which each, individually, was far from favoring.

The city of New York is to-day the commercial capital of America; and the principal causes of its growth from the first were commercial causes. The Dutch traders came to the New World to The Settlers
York. make money; picked out an advantageous site for a town; and began the task of building up a strictly material prosperity, without much reference to religious propagandism, the chance for "freedom to worship God," the education of the Indians, or mere adventure and discovery. Dutch civilization, however, as shown by the marvellous history of the Netherlands, is based upon integrity, courage, and conviction, and all these qualities appeared on Manhattan Island in the early days. The Dutch can be brave, patient, and in the highest degree intellectual when they will; and it is no disparagement to them, as a folk, to say that spiritual and mental progress were not uppermost in the minds of the early settlers of New Amsterdam. For half a century they governed New York, and the methods of government and the characteristics of the people, with all differences, were clearly Teutonic, and therefore in general accordance with those prevailing in New England.

Gradually the Dutch power, governmental and social, faded away ; the language, in a century, gave place to English ; but the effect of Dutch colonization has never ceased to be visible in New York.

The Middle Colonies. Trade and farming in the Middle States are more remunerative than anywhere else in the country, population is denser, and wealth is greater. But the school and the printing-press were not brought to the front as soon as in New England, though means for procuring education and reading were more available in New York and the Central colonies than in the Southern. The immediate effect of English rule in New York, it should be added, was not favorable. The English and Dutch influences were mutually hostile, and between them it came to pass that New York youths studied outside the colony, if at all, and home reading was not common among those of either sex. Manor-house life, here and in the South, was not very advantageous to the general speed of intellectual progress ; and patroon exclusiveness too often barred out mental good as well as social intrusion. But in the towns was a broader life ; money was tolerably plenty, society was gay, amusements abounded, and foreign customs and influences were not unknown. The already cosmopolitan and polyglot New York of two centuries ago, or the New York of the period just New York City. previous to the Revolution, contained within it the germs of its present greatness, as well as of its present defects. Because of its commercial prominence, it has become the principal distributing centre of literature, art, music, and general culture in America ;—so much at least may be set to the indirect credit of its early settlers, aided by the natural advantages of location. The later English influence in the Middle colonies, differed from that exerted in New England in religious purpose, not in general race-characteristics. New York City and State have therefore affected American literature in a broader and more cosmopolitan, but less earnest and powerful, manner than have Boston and New England. The local characteristics of the distributing centre are modified more and more by the steady influx of intelligent men and women from other parts of the country, who go to New York as they would go from Edinburgh to London. New York, and not Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, or San Francisco, is able to present some picture of the country as a whole. It is not, and will not be, to the United States just what London is to England or Paris to France, but its general relation is similar to that of the two great European literary capitals. And it should not be forgotten that from New York and Pennsylvania, not from Massachusetts or Virginia, came those books which first gave America a literary name in Europe.

The influence of the Friends in Pennsylvania has always been great; and to them is due in large measure the sedate and honest charac-^{Pennsylvania.}ter of the great State. But other religious denominations—Mennonites, Moravians, Dunkards, and more numerous Lutherans and Presbyterians—brought their religious zeal to the settlement of its broad fields. The Germans have abounded within its borders, and

Scotch, Irish and Welsh have left some impress upon its character. The Swedes in Delaware were less influential than the Germans in Pennsylvania, and were sooner assimilated. The survival of German forces in Pennsylvania is shown in the "Pennsylvania-Dutch" dialect, and in the calm and Christ-like life of the Moravian settlements of Bethlehem, Nazareth, and Litiz. The Germans early established presses and published books, many of which were devotional. Toleration was in vogue, and the non-martial spirit of the Friends and Moravians promoted the welfare of the commonwealth. To the Puritan, the Continental ideas of some of the Pennsylvanians seemed dangerously lax, but piety was the rule, and license the exception. Schools and hospitals were established, and the study of science was favored. Franklin, the great intellectual force in Philadelphia in the eighteenth century, was undoubtedly able to do a greater work than he would have found possible in Massachusetts. Philanthropy, hygiene, and household thrift were everywhere considered, and the average comfort was greater than in any other colony. The printing-press was always active in Philadelphia, which became for a time both the political and the literary capital of the New World. Postal facilities were fair, and if to these external conditions had been added, by the several elements in the population, a stronger, sterner, or perhaps more selfish spirit of intellectual assertion, this favored region would have become a greater literary nursery. When the Friends fell into a minority, they were still potent, but their range of ambition was more limited than that of the Massachusetts Puritans. Literature has always owed more to the positive virtues, however tarnished, than to the negative, however pleasing.

New Jersey, in its race-elements and in its social and intellectual development, resembled New York, while Delaware was like Pennsylvania. Newark, New Jersey's chief city, was of ^{New Jersey.} New England parentage, but did not long retain its early characteristics. The intellectual control of the colony, at the time of the Revolution, was in Presbyterian hands, and to the solid learning of some of the Princeton divines its literary development has been due, in good measure. In ^{Maryland.} Maryland, notwithstanding the courtly element in its society, the toleration extended by the Roman Catholics, and the benignant influence of the proprietary authorities, general education was not successfully provided, reading was unfashionable, and libraries were few. The creditable revival of learning and literature in Baltimore and the District of Columbia was due to other than original causes, and was postponed for many years.

Of the Southern commonwealths of America, Virginia was the largest and most important, ^{The Southern Colonies.} and its race-characteristics may be considered as those dominant in the whole Southern section.

The people and customs of Virginia differed, to be sure, from those of the Carolinas and ^{North Carolina.} Georgia. North Carolina was inhabited by a population inferior to that of the Old Dominion in wealth, education, and enterprise. The "poor white" element was strong. Social affairs were in a crude condition, learned men were few in the professions, manufactures and commerce were unimportant, and the life of the colony was little more than a comparatively indolent struggle for bread. Settlements were small and scattered; no printing press was set up before 1764; there was no college; and schools scarcely existed. The conditions for literary growth in North Carolina hardly appeared prior to the Revolution. South Carolina, South Carolina, though resembling North Carolina in physical characteristics, was more fortunate. The class of English settlers was of a higher order, and the foreign elements in the population were a source of added strength. The French Protestants were numerous, and here, as wherever else they settled, were frugal, industrious, intelligent, and often rich. A respectable German body was welcomed, and so were the Highland Scotch and the Scotch-Irish Presbyterians from the north of Ireland. The Church of England was at first established by law, but unsuccessfully; the religious legislation for a hundred years was strict, and almost of the Massachusetts pattern. Religion, established or dissenting, was at the root of the work of the colony, and gave it a great advantage over its more depraved Northern neighbor. Drunkenness, however, was a vice so prevalent as to be an element of great danger, and the better classes, surrounded by numerous slaves, were physically idle, though intellectually able to keep the upper hand. Education in the colony, and for the poor and middle classes, was a languishing affair, but the sons of the well-to-do planters and merchants often studied abroad. Under these conditions, of course, literature was not early developed, though from the aristocracy came alert leaders in state-craft and oratory—the intellectual avocations most likely to succeed in such a community. Georgia, at the present time the most promising Southern State, was settled late, by Georgia. the intrepid Oglethorpe, with earnest Englishmen in his company. The famous Wesleys, Charles and John, worked in Georgia for a time, to the injury of the colony, on the whole; George Whitefield also labored there, at least doing no harm; and the ever-zealous Moravians and the faithful Friends came in small numbers. Philanthropy was in vogue; the very aim of the founders was to provide for the poor, especially the debtor class, and for orphans and the friendless. An attempt was even made, though unsuccessfully, to prohibit slavery and keep out rum. The depraved classes were naturally numerous, for a time, and attempts to foster particular industries were injurious; but after thirty or forty years the natural wealth of the region, and the closer management of affairs by the government of Great Britain, brought about a steady and hopeful development, which gave scope to the admirable aims of many of the settlers. Education, however, was belated, and literature non-existent for many years.

The dominant influence in the Southern colonies was that of Virginia. We have seen that the seeds of Northern development were sown on the shores of

responding importance, for the other great section of the United States, is to be assigned to the commencement of Virginian civilization between the York and James rivers. The settlers at Jamestown in 1607, the beginners of the new nation, were of pure English stock, and in all race-characteristics were at one with the builders of Plymouth, Boston, and Salem. But between the two bodies there were important marks of difference. The first Virginian colonists represented the Church of England, not the Independents and Puritans. While laborers were included in their number, the greater portion consisted of men of aristocratic family. Adventure and enrichment in the New World were the leading objects, rather than religious freedom, of which the Anglicans, of course, had no lack at home. Some of the colonists were willing to work, but unable to do so, effectively, because of their unfamiliarity with manual labor. Toilers with the hand were less numerous than in Massachusetts,—though not a few of the Puritans and the Pilgrims were men of high education. This lack crippled Virginia's progress for many years, and it was not made good by the development of slavery. The presence of a planter class, unused to physical toil, accounts for many of the failures—as well as for some of the successes—of Virginia and the South for two centuries and a half. And at the first—save for Bartholomew Gosnold and John Smith—there was a lack even of that competent leadership which so favored the progress of the Northern settlements. Among the colonists of every grade there was also for some time a lack of homes; for, as in the California immigration of 1849, the gold-seekers and adventurers did not bring their families with them. These circumstances account, in large measure, for the more solid prosperity of New England, as compared with Virginia, in the first half of the seventeenth century.

By 1650, however, the commonwealth of Virginia had begun to rise to the commanding position it so long retained in the American society. Towns were almost wholly lacking, but in the homes of the planters were comfort and the influences of manorial centres. Education was cared for, at least in the higher circles, though the absence of villages forbade the existence of many schools. As early as 1619 a college had been arranged for, and in 1693 the establishment of William and Mary College at Williamsburg gave the colony an educational centre at the capital and political head-quarters. Religion was protected by the local government, which supported the Episcopal clergy by taxation. Intolerance and persecution, not unmixed with superstition, disgraced the colony for a time, and even printing was suppressed; but these evils gradually faded away, and different religious denominations, and the Williamsburg printing-press, were given a fairer chance. The Established Church was, it is true, affected for many years by the evil influences which so far removed the Church of England in the eighteenth century from the spirit of early Christianity; but among the Virginia Episcopal clergy were many men of zeal, learning, and integrity, and the sober and virtuous temper, though not the average learning, of the Dissenters was quite equal to that of the Episcopalians. Trade was subordinate to agriculture, and under the latter head tobacco was the all-important item. The rich soil promoted wealth, and also tempted to habits of extravagance. Slaves abounded; above them was the "poor white" class, partly recruited by convict transportation; then came the middle class of worthy farmers, including Scotch-Irish Presbyterians and some Germans; while at the top were the comparatively rich and intelligent, though sometimes idle and dissipated, representatives of the Cavaliers. Foreign elements were small in percentage, and Virginia was an English colony, working under many disadvantages of class-relations, in favorable climatic conditions.

The best Virginians—the leading section of the population—were manly men, Englishmen through and through, lovers of liberty and order, broad in thought and generous in act. They were inferior to the Puritans in intensity of conviction, but superior to them in catholic temper. Their education was often mediocre, but they were men of the world and of affairs, accustomed and able to rule. They visited England, where some of them studied, and they brought back something of London life and characteristics, as well as the standard English books of the day. Williamsburg, small and unimpressive as it was, boasted of cavalier graces unknown in the North. From the Virginia aristocracy, whatever its faults,—and because of the manorial system whose leaders were accustomed to rule,—sprang the great Virginians who were so prominent in the Revolution, and who made the State the “mother of presidents.” In brief, as Massachusetts showed the world how potent could be English village life in a new land, so Virginia displayed the workings of the squirearchy. The town-meeting was the starting-point of Northern civilization ; the planter’s mansion of Southern.

At the time of the Declaration of Independence, the new nation—if such it could be called—stretched from Maine to Georgia on the Atlantic seaboard. Florida was Spanish, and Louisiana, the great region west of the Mississippi, ^{The West.} was also under actual Spanish ownership, though largely French in population and social characteristics. The sparsely settled “Northwest Territory” included the present States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, with a part of Minnesota. By purchase or conquest the United States has covered all these, and stretched westward to the Pacific Ocean, until its marine line on that ocean is almost opposite the original one on the Atlantic. Both Northern and Southern colonists steadily marched westward, carrying with them their characteristics of race, society, and religion. “Unto him that hath shall be given” ; the Northern emigrants to the West were more numerous than the Southern ; the configuration of the continent gave them more land to occupy ; and a newer New England gradually appeared in Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, California, and elsewhere. Southern traits were similarly transferred to Alabama and Missisissippi (formerly parts of Georgia), and Virginia and the Carolinas gave their tone to Tennessee and Kentucky ; while all the Southern colonies were duplicated in some degree in the States arising west of the Mississippi, and in parts of the territories. In New Orleans was the peculiar French and Creole society, a bit of Gallic life in the New World, with quaint and sturdy characteristics, fond of the old home, but at last patriotic in the new. Its influence was social and industrial rather than literary.

All through these newer parts of the United States, governed by the English stock of the Northern and Southern colonies, have poured streams of foreign immigration,—especially in the Northern division. In some of the territories the men of foreign birth are actually in the majority, and foreign elements are large throughout the whole West. As in the East the Irish, Germans, and French Canadians are employed in manufacturing establishments and in mines, so the Germans and Scandinavians are farmers in the Northwest, and foreigners of various names are farmers, cattle-raisers, and miners on the Pacific coast. But wherever they are, they soon become Americanized, in greater or less degree, and do not remain isolated or unassimilated elements,—with the exception of the Chinese, Italians, and Hungarians. Still more generally is this found to be true in considering the foreign race-elements in American literature, which, in the West and Southwest, as elsewhere, are merely subordinate influences. Literature, in the vast region outside the thirteen original colonies, is English literature, sprung from the same sources and influenced by the same conditions that affected the literature of the Atlantic seaboard. One writer finds themes among the Louisiana Creoles, another in the lake country of Ohio and Michigan, another in the wild Tennessee mountains, another among the raw settlers of early Arkansas, another with the Californian miners, another in life on the plains, or in the Sierra Nevada mountains, or among the Indians ; but writers and literature are English, under somewhat unfamiliar conditions, but never under a new race-domination.

CHAPTER II.

THE NEW ENVIRONMENT OF THE SAXON MIND.

THE physical conditions of the present territory of the United States have aided, from the outset, in its political and industrial, and by corollary its intellectual development. Situated in the middle of North America, possessing a great number of harbors, lakes, and water-ways, affording a wide variety of soil and climate, and on its European settlement inhabited by a relatively small number of wandering Indians, this great region lent itself readily to the work of the principal colonization in the world's history. Its rich forests and fields, its suitable town-sites and advantageous drainage basins, its hidden mines, its natural lines of communication with the sea, formed the basis for future national development. Race and physical forces have wrought, in this favored region, the results which a student of social science, had such existed two centuries and a half ago, might have foretold with a reasonable degree of confidence.

The United States, like most of the leading nations of the world at the present time, is practically a cold-weather country. On the northern coast were most of the populous early settlements, and there the chief commercial influence has remained. From the northeast corner of the land, too, have come the greater part of the books which must be considered at length in these pages. Climate does not make character ; still less does it produce literature. Cold weather cannot, by itself, make good writers, else Canada would have more literature to show. But the fact remains that the dominant forces in the world's civilization are now exerted from the northern part of highly civilized Europe and the United States, just as, two or three thousand years ago, they were exerted from the southern part of Europe and Asia. To this fact, as bearing upon questions of climate, the history of the United States adds a force hardly exerted by the records of an older civilization.

The cognate relation of mountains to liberty and free thought, however, need not specially be considered here, for the seaboard and lowlands of the United States have produced its leaders in statecraft no less than in literature. The mountain regions of the country are still sparsely settled, and have produced a small indigenous literature.

In considering the physical features of the country, which have chiefly influenced the distribution of its population, and in some lesser degree its literary growth, it must be remembered, however, that the literature, still more than the industries, of many of its sections must be a thing of future development. The country stretches from 25° to 49° in latitude, and from 67° to 125° in longitude ; and its mean annual temperature ranges from below 40° to 75° and over. The annual rain-fall varies from 10 inches to 60, and the elevation from the sea-level rises to more than 10,000 feet. None but the most general deductions are possible, in considering a territory of this size, as to the effect of physical forces upon character. If New England has produced its Hawthorne, Emerson and Longfellow, no less can Virginia point to her Washington and Jefferson. But in the intellectual contest, the "stern and rock-bound coast" has usually had the advantage over the "sunny South" or the rich Western plains. Where cold freezes genius, or where heat enervates it, we cannot look for great books—save perhaps in Iceland; but it is enough to say that at present the greater literary productiveness seems to appear in the lands of the winter fire and the evening lamp, by the stormy sea which our ancestors have braved and loved for a thousand years.

The colonial relation of the English-speaking (and Dutch and Swedish) settlements in America was of greater importance than the ordinary occupation of a distant land by subjects of a crown. It was the precursor of the independence of a great nation; its partial freedom naturally developed into emancipation from the control of the old home; and it powerfully affected the politics, religion, and society of Europe itself. England owned the land, but varied her assertion of authority with virtual permission of local self-government; and she was content to leave the colonists somewhat to themselves, while she herself was slowly assuming, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the first position in the commerce of the world. New England was almost openly contemptuous of Charles I. and Charles II.; and though the English colonies, in theory, were crown property,—not governed by Parliament, even,—and were occasionally oppressed and insulted, the half-independent revolution of 1688–9, in Boston, against Sir Edmund Andros, was a sign of incipient democracy rather than of humble colonialism. Nor was it the act of a dependent when Governor William Shirley (though he was in general a believer in royal authority) issued in 1755 a proclamation for the enforcement of a law passed by the General Court of the colony, laying duties upon vellum, parchment, and paper. Stamps were actually made for this taxation, and though the enactment was “in behalf of his majesty the king,” it was the willing work of a self-respecting colony, which indignantly spurned, ten years later, the royal attempt to force the use of stamps by virtue of mere kingly prerogative. This spirit of independence was furthered by the French-and-Indian war, which likewise promoted the idea of confederation for a common good in the presence of a common danger.

Nevertheless, the colonies were colonial and provincial in many ways, and felt like poor relations in the presence of the material ^{Provincial-}ism. and intellectual wealth of England. Writers, in particular, kept their eyes fixed on England; indeed, it would have been better if they had copied more than they did, for their imitations were too often ridiculously below the originals. Before Franklin there was almost no native intellectual work of the first class. As late as 1807 Fisher Ames said that we were never likely to have an American literature, and that, so far, we had produced nothing worth mentioning, save a political treatise or two. "Shall we," he satirically inquired, "match Joel Barlow against Homer or Hesiod? Can Thomas Paine contend against Plato?" Previous to the Revolution things had been, of course, in a worse condition, and fulsome puffery of such writers as Anne Bradstreet or Phillis Wheatley—mere curiosities in the field of general literature—deceived no one in England, though it gratified some American patriots. Strength that in Europe could be bestowed upon literature and art was needed in America in the struggle for life and in the development of politics. There was plenty of ability in New England, New York, Virginia, and South Carolina, but in the colonial days it did not, and could not, often take the literary form. Colonialism in literature was sometimes subserviency, sometimes boastful self-assertion; but in either shape it had to bide its time before it could grow into something better.

A dependent feeling on the part of colonial residents is both natural and necessary. Whatever the religious and political differences between the American colonies and England, the former were properly continuing, in most respects, the language, institutions, purpose, and attitude of the residents of England from the time of the Saxon invasion of 449. Nor could the feeling of colonial dependency be eliminated at once. Even at the present time it should be remembered that our colonial career lasted a century and a half, while our national life has covered only a century. Libraries, centres of book and newspaper publication, museums, architectural monuments, long-lasting houses, populous intellectual centres, rich and fashionable life, were all abroad. At first, nails and bricks had to be imported, then books and luxuries. A certain humility toward foreign critics naturally existed, nor could it be thrown off before the intellectual and social environment had changed. Political emancipation is one thing, a rounded and complete national life another thing. The Declaration of Independence could not sever ties more than a thousand years old, nor create at once a life free from the feeling of habitual deference. This feeling has survived in some minds, though with ever-weakening force. It comes by direct descent through the more timid Federalists of 1812, and offsets the furious and intensely patriotic indignation once aroused by the publication of such books as Dickens' "American Notes" or Mrs. Trollope's "Social Manners of the Americans."

But long ago were laid the foundations of a self-respecting spirit which, in literature as in life, is unduly excited neither by the studious praise of one foreign critic nor by the waspish sting of another. Franklin, Jefferson, Hamilton, and serene Washington showed that the colonial relation had ceased, and that its results must be temporary. The Growth of Self-reliance. The war of 1812 increased the sense of independence; and the United States was henceforth old enough, with the patriotic though not infallible Noah Webster, to read and speak the words of an "American Dictionary of the English Language."

There can be no question that the United States is a nation, in the strictest sense of the word. The discussions of a century ago have not yet died away, and tens of thousands still think centralization in America a more menacing foe than disintegration. The rights of the States are and must be zealously guarded, as of old, and local interests can never be permitted to be crushed or forgotten by the general government. But while it is doubtless true that the present national government, if foreseen in its entirety a hundred years ago, would not have been adopted by the thirteen original States, differing among themselves, and fearing a new foe to constitutional independence, it is also true that its existing nature and powers are the solid creation of years, not likely to be materially changed in our day. By the development of national character in the fight for independence ; by later experience in war and peace ; by struggle, victory, and defeat of party and faction ; by annexation and abandonment of territory ; by settlement of political, financial, and social questions ; and finally by four years of war, it has come to pass that the existence and sovereignty of the nation have been made secure. Slowly but steadily the federal idea has gained at the expense of the confederate, until the great majority of American citizens instinctively say : "The United States is a nation," not "The United States are a confederation." Between absolutism at the one extreme and anarchy at the other, stand the essentially united American people, with common hopes and a common destiny. Many a despotic government is far more influenced by localism than is the great American republic, with few dialects, with no sectional quarrels save those which have become comparatively unimportant, and with a constant tendency toward a uniform type.

This fact, of course, influences and will influence American literature in a marked degree. The differences between Boston and New York; Philadelphia and Chicago; Cincinnati and Charleston, or even San Francisco and A Unified Nation. New Orleans, are really superficial and unimportant. They change their skies, not their political and essential social condition, who go from the Atlantic to the Pacific, or from the Lakes to the Gulf. The uniform type toward which the whole country tends is, of course, somewhat different from the English type, in minor respects, though resembling it in essentials.

Again, the United States is the only nation of highest civilization, in all North and South America, and it is separated from its civilized peers An Isolated Nation. in Europe by thousands of miles of broad ocean. Its isolation powerfully affects the national type, already influenced by many and varied powers of race and climate. Having passed beyond the distinctly imitative period, though in constant communication with the Old World, the whole nation exists, speaks, and works after a fashion of its own. The national type affects and changes those brought under its influence, and approximates them to itself; thus increasing its powers and its peculiarities, though not becoming alienated from fellowship with that which is best in foreign lands. The conservatism of Europe has restrained American extravagancies, while too far removed to crush American independence of thought and action. The broader the productive field, and the more uniform its intelligent cultivation, the greater the chance of intellectual product.

The isolation of the United States has also aided its growth by promoting and almost requiring its freedom from foreign wars and political entanglements. "Our relations with foreign powers continue to be A Peaceable Nation. amicable,"* is a phrase which, in substance, often occurs in American state-documents, and which records a fact desired by the ablest statesmen of all political parties. Strength, men, and money are kept at home for home development. The absence of customary foreign wars, the extreme unlikelihood of any aggressive or defensive conflict with a European power, tend to keep the people of the United States in a peaceable frame of mind at home. Nothing could be farther from the truth than to call the Americans an excitable or bellicose people. They fight when needs be, but prefer peace at home and abroad. The great civil war of 1861-65, arising from causes not likely to be repeated, actually left the country more unified than it found it. Political assassination, not unknown in the United States, is a "gratuitously awful crime," † not affecting national institutions in the slightest degree. Close elections, preceded by exciting political campaigns, like that of 1884, disturb American society and American finances less than a petty fracas would disturb Spain, France, or Italy.* Even a political contest like that of 1876, when half the voters in the country were doubtful whether the elected candidate had been given the presidential chair, did not arouse intestine tumults. Purely socialistic disorders can be quelled more easily in the great American cities than in European capitals, partly because of this peaceable habit of the citizens, rich and poor, and partly because property is more widely distributed. Even the denizens of "shanty-town" in New York City own some property, and do not want a communistic distribution of their goats and geese. The stability of American institutions is underestimated by those who have never watched the Americanizing process through which the immigrant soon passes. A people essentially peaceable, in all classes, is sure to be a tolerably well-educated people, and therefore one affording a good basis for literary work.

The high resolve so nobly worded in Abraham

* "Since the close of your last session the American people in the exercise of their highest right of suffrage have chosen their chief magistrate for the four years. When it is remembered that at no period in the country's history has the long political contest which customarily precedes the day of the national election, been waged with greater fervor and intensity, it is a subject of general congratulation that, after the controversy at the polls was over, and while the slight preponderance by which the issue had been determined was as yet unascertained, the public peace suffered no disturbance, but the people everywhere patiently and quietly awaited the result. Nothing could more strikingly illustrate the temper of the American citizen, his love of order, and his loyalty to law. Nothing could more signally demonstrate the strength and wisdom of our political institutions."—President ARTHUR'S Message to Congress, 1884.

Rascals and ignoramus vote in the United States, while intelligent women and bright and ingenuous youths are denied the right; and unqualified immigrants and freedmen have full powers of self-government, so far as the law can give them those powers. But the town-meeting of the colonies has developed into no commune to-day. Intelligence and morality are at the top; in the long run they are at the top even in the South, with its sharp distinctions of race and competence, or in New York, the receptacle of the residuum of a part of debased foreign society. In America the majority rules the minority, and the majority is ruled by the principles of Anglo-Saxon ethics, developed by education. Because these principles can be more freely developed, because this education can be made more general, American institutions are more stable and American thought more sound than the institutions and thought of people less favorably situated and less completely in earnest.* Nor has the growth of wealth seriously endangered American institutions and thought. The spirit of the ancestors survives, though modern Americans are more comfortable in their daily lives. The country was rich in 1861, but its wealth did not hinder or obscure patriotism, heroism, the noblest self-sacrifice. The true life and spirit burn beneath the external adornment. The late Vice-President Wilson once told me that, in his opinion, there was more self-sacrifice in the North (the same was true of the South) during the war of 1861 than during that of 1776. This spirit will show itself still, whenever there is need. It cannot glitter and shine as in the days of war and of new building ; but it exists and works in the soberer time of slow and steady development. For its strength it chiefly depends upon patient, sound, far-reaching education. America will have fewer leaders in the years to come ; but it will have as many workers.* In a period of peace many of these workers naturally turn to literature. Wars have done little for American literature ; peace has done much, and will do more.

* " In the period of erection there were great architects and master builders ; in the period of constitutional interpretation there were, at a distance from the people, great political schoolmen, who pondered and expounded the letter of the law, and, nearer the people, great constitutional advocates, who cast the doctrines of the schoolmen into policy ; and in the period of abolitionist agitation there were great masters of feeling and leaders of public purpose. The period of Federal construction is long passed ; questions of constitutional interpretation are no longer regarded as of pressing urgency ; the war has been fought, even the embers of its issues being now almost extinguished : and we are left to that unexciting but none the less capitally important business of every-day peaceful development and judicious administration, to whose execution every nation in its middle age has to address itself with what sagacity, energy, and prudence it can command."—"Congressional Government: A Study in American Politics." By Woodrow Wilson. Boston, 1885.

Constant care, of course, is needed to keep the percentage of illiteracy below the danger-mark ; for upon this depends not only the average literary chance of productiveness, but the safety of the nation itself. Thus there was, in 1880, in every Southern State, a larger percentage of whites unable to read and write than in any Northern one,—a circumstance the bearing of which upon literary product is as obvious,—and as much a subject of regret,—to the resident of one section as to that of another. In the State of South Carolina the illiteracy (of whites and blacks) was 55.4 per cent., a fact which emphasizes the need of the earnest efforts now being made by nation, State, and individual toward the education of the freed blacks. In the whole country, however, the average of illiteracy was but 9.4 per cent.,—certainly very small in view of all conditions, past and present. The South is bending its efforts earnestly toward the betterment of its school work, and the general outlook for education in America, with its prevalent public school system, is better than that in any other great nation save Germany. Its geographical isolation has not had the usual effect of retarding educational progress.

To the separateness of the nation is also due, in large measure, its religious freedom, and the number of Christian denominations within its borders. Freed, to a great extent, from the domination of ecclesiastical authority and precedent, and from the first an asylum for men oppressed for conscience' sake, the United States favors the multiplicity of religious bodies, not only by reason of its wide extent of territory, but also because of its distance from the national or would-be universal churches of Europe. Denominations which in England exert a comparatively small influence,—such as the Methodist, Baptist, Lutheran, or Disciples',—rise to great numerical and spiritual importance in America, and lead the religious life of millions of communicants. It is a significant fact that among the presidents of the United States have been members of, or regular worshippers at, Episcopal, Congregational, Unitarian, Presbyterian, Reformed, Disciples', and Methodist churches, besides two who, like Franklin, were simply theists. The United States is so prevalingly Protestant that probably no Roman Catholic could be elected president, but with this exception the religious belief of presidential candidates is not even thought of, in exciting elections. But a Roman Catholic has held the highest judicial position in the United States; many others have been senators; and since the Constitution requires that the president be of native birth, and prominent Roman Catholics are often of foreign birth, the question of the presidential eligibility of a member of this church has not yet been fully tested. No other religious body in the United States (the Episcopalians and Moravians included) feels any potent foreign influence; and an American Roman Catholic parish or communicant soon becomes partially Americanized, and differs materially from one in France, Spain, Italy, or Austria. The Protestant population in the United States is greatly in the majority; the country is a Christian and believing one, in little danger of atheism, communism, or the "Goddess of Reason"; but it is at heart liberal and tolerant, and is rapidly becoming more so. The pessimistic student of social science can hardly deny that the experiment of religious freedom, on a large scale, has thus far been successfully carried out in the American nation.

It is not easy to say how much the American nation has lost, or how much it has gained, by its Lack of Historic Background. lack of historic and artistic background. Crudeness and rawness must inevitably be found in a newly settled land, and literature, in particular, suffers in an environment which is crude and raw. But if American literature has lacked, and still lacks in a considerable degree, the aid of external elements of historic tradition, romance, and culture, it is the American mind, after all, which has made that literature possible.

Advantages of Isolation. This American mind, on the whole, has gained by its isolation. The English inheritance of culture and temper it shares with Englishmen, and the meagre surroundings of the American intellect have by no means been a disadvantage unmixed with good. Those who work in ill-equipped solitude, or far from bases of intellectual supplies, must think; and if their minds are stored, their thinking is not destroyed because they are remote from treasures of architecture, painting, and literature. The cold-weather minds in early New England were zealous, prudent, and independent; and if their local world was meanly supplied with luxuries, it did not distract them from a solid intellectual purpose. That purpose was not literary, at first; but high intellectual independence is sure to produce literature sooner or later, when it recognizes the real bounds of its freedom, and gathers schools and scholars about it. American isolation promoted active religious work; religion soon demanded political freedom as well as spiritual; and the free prayer and the free vote left the whole mind free. Cotton Mather, Samuel Adams, Ralph Waldo Emerson—the logical sequence is as clear as the chronological. This history is repeating itself in newer parts of the United States. A lazy folk is content in luxury and crushed in adversity, but a Saxon people, in a remote new home, carries with it what mental equipment it can, thinks when it cannot work, and out of this thought in times of enforced separation and leisure, devises for its children something better than it had for itself.

As the American rural community became the county town, and the county town the city, there grew up, in later years, a city life unlike that of Europe. Though American literature owes more, as yet, to country freedom than to city wealth, the recent increase in the number of cities in the United States has somewhat changed the intellectual life of the nation. City life in America is deeply Cities and the Intellectual Life. marked by the effects of isolation from Europe. A New England or Virginia village is less different from an English village than is an American city from a city in England or on the Continent. Ancient buildings, spots sacred with historic legend, invaluable galleries of paintings, rich museums—all these are lacking, in large measure. This enforced poverty America strives to ameliorate in various ways. She treasures with jealous care her comparatively few battle-grounds and revolutionary head-quarters, and her small legendary lore. Pictures and books are gathered in public and private collections, and museums of antiquities are multiplied, to take the place, in part, of the richer European galleries. The American has more than the usual Saxon mania for travel, and he brings home with him as much of Europe as he can. He reads London papers, dwells in continental hotels, and buys antiquities with absurd freedom of purse, not so much from a lingering sense of colonialism, as from a desire to make good the inevitable lack at home. One cannot have the freedom of the forest with the conveniences and culture of the city, but the eager American would fain be intensely American and yet cosmopolitan. He succeeds in this hard task better, at any rate, than others have done. Eastern America is in fact both old and new—bound to Europe by a thousand ties of the intellect, and close to the Western States in heart and essential national purpose. If the American of the past was too ready to make a money offer for European culture that money could not buy, his wiser successor, prizing the isolation of his American home, makes it richer and more fruitful by the neighborhood of as much of the Old-World treasure as he can get and use.

Again, as we have seen, the people is comparatively homogeneous, so that the local characteristics of American cities—and their literary and artistic resources, for they all accumulate æsthetic wealth under similar conditions—do not differ as in the case of European cities, even of the minor class. Florence differs from Rome, or Edinburgh from London, more than Boston from New York; and the literary man cannot find in all America, backgrounds as different from each other as that of Paris is different from Berlin. That the greater American cities and their contents are unlike, and that they have individual characters, is very true; but their unlikeness is comparatively slight, for the reason that their development has sprung from like conditions. This is the reason why the American man of letters, and especially the later American novelist, so often writes about European scenes and characters. His nation is isolated; and therefore he often treats of the foreign background and environment. But he looks at them in an American way, and the mind of his books is native and unchanged, as far as its point of view is concerned. The American inheritance of English and other European culture has been used in a manner that, with occasional exceptions, is far from imitative. American literature may be described as isolated inheritance, working freshly.

Without dwelling further upon the various relations of political, social, and intellectual life in the United States as toward foreign nations (upon all of which relations, it should be said, the prevalent protective tariff has a certain effect, sometimes stimulating, sometimes deadening), we pass to a preliminary survey of some leading influences affecting American literature within the country itself.

Boston. Boston, the chief city of New England, has always been a centre of political and religious liberality. Two hundred years ago it had its first revolution, and the revolutionary spirit has never ceased to be felt near Faneuil Hall, the Old State-House, and the Old South Church. But its reforms have been grounded in a genuine conservatism. That Boston used to be the literary capital of the United States (though never in the sense in which London and Paris are literary capitals), was due to its academic traditions and social solidity quite as much as to its radicalism. Its religious, political, or literary reformers have usually sprung from a society distinctly conservative. The literature of Boston and Massachusetts is grounded in the past, and has come, for the most part, from representatives of old families. Longfellow, Lowell, Emerson, Holmes, Everett, Prescott, Motley, Hawthorne, Wendell Phillips, and Charles Sumner, were sons of aristocrats, in the best sense, and were developed in the slow processes of an old culture in an old home. Their poems, essays, speeches, histories, and romances were evolved by quiet growth in long-settled community-life, rich in many ways, two centuries old in mere time, and older than that in direct descent of influences. Boston culture readily assimilated Carlyle and Goethe and the "time-spirit" of 1825, but it was in no sense created by them. The pulse of genius stirred its blood, but the blood had been purified through years of scholarly thought and life. For this reason American literature, when it really began to live, grew quickly in Boston, but not because of any temporary influences there exerted. As the same or similar conditions have been found elsewhere in America, like results have followed. Boston dared be radical, because it felt the weight of scholarship and social conservatism behind it. Its idealism had a real foundation.

It should by no means be said that a high and noble career in America can only come from the ^{Aristocracy} older, conservative, and highly developed ^{and} Democratic regions, such as New England or Virginia. The whole history of the country refutes such an assertion. Many a poor, or lowly-born, or uneducated man has emerged from early circumstances like those of President Lincoln, and has risen to eminence and deserved renown. No country in the world offers to its poor young men better chances for success in politics, business, or some of the walks of professional life. But literature usually comes from the middle and higher social classes. A Robert Burns is an exception in the literary history of any nation; and peasant authors are really as rare in democratic America as in aristocratic England. This remark applies to all parts of the United States. Take, for instance, twenty prominent names in American literature and thought—Cotton Mather, Edwards, Franklin, Jefferson, Irving, Cooper, Longfellow, Whittier, Bryant, Lowell, Holmes, Poe, Emerson, Hawthorne, Bancroft, Webster, Calhoun, James, Cable, and Whitman. Of these, thirteen were of New England birth (Poe, though born in Boston, was really a Southerner), four natives of the Middle States, and three of the Southern. Of these, Franklin, Whittier, Webster, and Whitman were the only ones whose early circumstances were forbidding, and the parents of all four were intelligent and locally prominent,—by no means of the illiterate class. Fourteen of the twenty were college bred; of the others, Irving and Henry James, Jr., had exceptional advantages in youth, while Whittier and Whitman were country editors. A similar intellectual environment surrounded the lesser American authors. There is no aristocracy in the United States save that of righteousness, intelligence, and good-breeding, handed down from father to son; but from this aristocracy the literature of the nation has sprung.

Public libraries are numerous in the cities and larger towns of the New England States; and the influence of these libraries upon the production of literature is marked. The city of Boston has in its public library, supported by taxation as well as by gifts, more volumes than there are inhabitants in the city. Sometimes a similar admirable showing can be made by smaller New England cities. In Hallowell, Maine, with a population of 3,000, there is a library of 5,000 volumes. The manufacturing and laboring classes use the New England libraries to a considerable extent, and sometimes produce books themselves. A large printing establishment at Cambridge has both a library and a savings-bank for its workmen. In a watch factory at Waltham some 1500 are employed, two thirds of whom are women and girls. "These girls, who are all Americans, are as notably superior in intelligence and education to ordinary work-girls as the machines they superintend are superior to ordinary machinery. The works of standard authors are to be found on many work benches, to be read in the hour for luncheon ; and a recent visitor noticed that one of the girls had a Greek Testament on her bench, which she read in the intervals of her labor."* There is also an observatory connected with this factory, the astronomer being a young woman. In a well-ordered New England community "the mill, the school-house, the public library, and the church stand side by side." Centres of thought and culture are not to be found only on the New England seaboard. Cities and towns in the Middle and Western States similarly provide themselves with libraries and museums. Little colleges, of humble intellectual grade and of narrow means, abound in many States, and combine the work of the academy, the first year or two of the university, and the public library. Farmers, mechanics, and working-women in the United States, in many instances, read a daily paper, hear an occasional lecture, subscribe to a respectable magazine, and read and buy literature of a tolerably high order. The authors of Europe and America have a public in Western and Southern States not yet accounted literary in their product. But writing follows reading, and the field of literature moves westward as truly as the centre of population in successive census-maps. In all the intellectual life of America, as too often in its physical, is hurry, worry, nervousness, imperfection, waste ; but achievement also, and unmistakable promise.

* Report in the New York Evening Post.

If literature in the Northern States may be called Literature in the South. isolated, still more so has been that of the South. The planter-life, the semi-baronial system, the sharp distinction of classes (even among the whites), the absence of large towns or centres of culture—all these things have tended to give the South a literature of its own. Even publishers have been lacking in its cities, and the intellectual product has been chiefly carried to Northern presses, thence to be returned for home production, in large part. The South has not lacked the power of leadership, intellectual strength, culture, local pride, external inspiration; but it has not equalled the North in literary productiveness, especially of the higher class. This fact it formerly ascribed, too often, to the jealousy, or perverseness, or dulness of Northern critics, who, it asserted, formed mutual-admiration societies to crush Southern genius. Edgar A. Poe wrote of Edward Coate Pinkney: "It was the misfortune of Mr. Pinkney to have been born too far south. Had he been a New Englander, it is probable that he would have been marked as the first of American lyrists, by that magnanimous cabal which has so long controlled the destinies of American Letters, in conducting the thing called the North American Review." The spirit of colonialism which so long existed in the North, as toward England, was felt in the South, as toward the North. The colonial spirit is sometimes despondent, sometimes arrogant and self-asserting; and Southerners have veered between the two extremes, in considering their literary position. Many a Southern private library is rich in eighteenth-century classics, and its owner has read and duly appreciated the best writers in English literature : Shakespeare, Dryden, Addison, Gray, Goldsmith, Gibbon, Scott, Wordsworth, or even Thackeray ; but beside these he has too often put some local scribbler or " poetess," whose patriotism, or localism, was better than the literary product. The Southern critic has made too much of the idea of State pride, and has favored the sectional when he ought to have encouraged the universal.

These conditions, which have hitherto handicapped the literature of the Southern States, have become modified since the war. The South now has a considerable and increasing share in the making of American (not Southern) literature ; and her writers of the higher class are able and willing to rest their claims for fame upon their works, rather than upon their place of birth or residence. Mr. Cable, the first Southern writer since the war, and the one whose books gain most from their source and scene, would be the last to claim any attention because he is a " Southerner" or Louisianian. The future literature of the South will be abundantly able to take care of itself, whatever Northern critics or Southern adulators may say. With the removal of slavery and the development of education, inventive genius appears, factories and schools and libraries rise side by side, and literature begins to share in the strength once monopolized by law and politics.*

* " Webster is ours as well as Clay ; Everett and Sumner are ours as truly as Randolph and Calhoun. Is not Irving ours, and Prescott, and Halleck, no less than Poe ? The honored Hawthorne is ours, Emerson is ours, Longfellow is ours. . . . The South should no longer dream of a

The environment remains as it was, in physical characteristics, now lovely, now enervating; but the stimulus to literary production is keener. Larger Southern cities, with libraries and literary centres; Southern schools and universities (Johns Hopkins University belongs to the South); and best of all the consolidation of the nation since the war, and the spirit of industry which has risen since the abolition of slavery, will work out a wholesome result. Other States than Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina will have a considerable literary product,—a quickening such as has already been seen in Louisiana and Tennessee.

Looking at the American nation as a whole, with special reference to its capacities for literary production, the general conclusion must be a favorable one. In the United States work is too often hurried, and workers do not seem to know what rest and recuperation are. Money-getting is a prevalent mania, and when a man dies his success is sometimes measured by his fortune, not his intellectual achievement. A certain type of American neglects æsthetics while he pursues mammon; he turns away from present good, while he strives for future gain; he cares less for home, church, school, literature. While treating home subjects, let it be done for the whole nation; and you shall put your own State, not the less, but the more, in your debt; earn a double portion of her gratitude and love; add to these the general thanks of a vast country; and give the sisterhood of States a new interest in that sister whom you delight to call your mother and who will be proud to call you her son. . . . We want to purge ourselves of provincialism, and stop speaking of 'the new South';—what we must have in view is the 'no South.'—GEORGE W. CABLE, Commencement Address at the University of Mississippi, 1882.

ture, than for a "successful life," in the narrowest sense. He overworks and dies too soon, and after a dreary and material existence he enriches his family or endows a theological seminary, or very likely leaves a bankrupt's memory. To him the hotel has been more than the library, the stock-exchange better than the poem. He has benefited literature indirectly, if at all, and has got from it no good save the remote memory of school-day "reading-books," and the mixed instruction afforded by the daily newspaper. Such Americans have been depicted in novels a thousand times, duly described by Herbert Spencer, and delicately satirized by Matthew Arnold. They have existed, and they now exist. Missing the true meaning of life, they do not create or develop that literature which springs only from large and true life. Again, America has a criminal class, a great body of ignorant voters, a fashion of irreverence, a fondness for display, a subservient and title-hunting tendency strangely at variance with its better spirit of liberty. Fifty million people, in a republic based upon the most liberal plan of suffrage, must include the vicious, the ignorant, the extravagant, the plutocrat, the demagogue and his following. But when we take the larger view, when we study the general spirit and the average result, when we estimate in the severest way the state-craft, social economy, scientific product, education, and books of the nation, the whole, to say the least, compares favorably with the presentation made by any other land in the same period. American literature is the literature of a cultured and genuine Democracy, a sort of Saxon-Greek renaissance in the New World ; a liberty that is as far removed from anarchy as it is from despotism. If such a literature cannot exist and be true and grow great, then all the predictions of wise men from Plato to Milton, from Cicero to Victor Hugo, have been at fault.

CHAPTER III.

EARLY DESCRIPTIVE AND HISTORICAL WRITERS.

CAPTAIN JOHN SMITH was born in Willoughby by Alford, Lincolnshire, England, in January, 1579 (O. S.), having been baptized on the ninth day of that month. He was not a university graduate, and evidently had little education of the academic kind. By nature and by early choice he was a wanderer, pioneer, fighter, egotist. He served in the French army at the age of seventeen; fought in the Dutch army for three years in the Netherlands; was shipwrecked when twenty-one; travelled extensively on the Continent; was a soldier under Sigismund Bathori against the Turks in Transylvania, where, he claimed, he killed three Turks in single-combat; was, according to his own story, caught and enslaved in Constantinople; returned to England by way of Africa; and could call himself a battle-scarred veteran and an experienced traveller at twenty-five. The mania for colonization and enrichment in America was prevalent in London; Smith made the acquaintance of Bartholomew Gosnold, caught Gosnold's enthusiasm, and set sail with the adventurers and intending settlers who left London in three ships on December 19, 1606. On the voyage

he was arrested on the charge that he designed to kill his fellow-leaders and make himself "king of Virginia"; but he was released when the shores of Jamestown were reached, thereby, he assures us, escaping the "gallows," but temporarily losing his membership in the council of seven managers. He carefully explored interior Virginia and Chesapeake Bay; quarrelled with, sued, or executed several prominent colonists; and once more narrowly escaped condemnation to death. He finally quit Virginia in September, 1609, after two years of zeal, turmoil, and discovery, in which his services to the colony were great and of lasting value. Five years later he explored the New England coast, of which he made a map, and started to return thither with the idea of founding a colony in New England, in 1615. But captured by a French man-of-war off Flores, he was transported to Rochelle, after which his immediate career is doubtful. In 1616, having escaped, and receiving from James I. the title of "Admiral of New England," he actively turned his attention to book-making, chiefly with the unselfish idea of furthering schemes of American colonization. His influence upon subsequent Pilgrim and Puritan settlement in New England was considerable, but he reaped little material advantage from his incessant labors. He died in London in 1631, aged fifty-two, after a brave, intensely active, romantic, tolerably chivalrous, and, on the whole, decidedly useful life. His zeal was greater than his discretion, and his industry was often fruitless; but as an explorer and describer of American men, soil, and possibilities his service to the nascent colonies was unquestionable. This bald list of his adventures, discoveries, and doings explains his prominence in the American history of the seventeenth century.

His voluminous writings deserve but a humble place in literature. Strictly speaking, they are a part of English, not American, literature, for Smith's continuous residence on American soil was a matter of but two years' lasting; and, all told, he was in the New World but two years and eight months. It is uncertain what share Smith had in the writing of the works passing under his name; some of his assertions (as the famous legend of the rescue of his life by Pocahontas) are questionable, and others demonstrably false. At their best, his books lack high literary merit, and are material for the historian rather than the critic. The list of productions under his name is as follows:

A True Relation of such occurrences and accidents of noate as hath hapned in Virginia since the first planting of that Collony, which is now resident in the South part thereof, till the last return from thence. By Captaine Iohn Smith, sometimes Governour of Virginia, and Admirall of New England. London, 1631.

These cumbersome and almost illiterate title-pages are here reproduced because they sufficiently indicate, perhaps, the extent and range of the author's literary productions, and are also an index to his character, and an epitome of his life. The "Generall Historie of Virginia" comes the nearest to the border-line of pure literature, while the "Accidence for Young Seamen" is the farthest from that line. Sometimes Smith's narrative is strong, and it could not fail to be picturesque on occasion ; but its main value is that of historical material. When we consider that Smith wrote in the time of Bacon and Shakespeare (one of his letters to "Sir Ffrances Bacon" has been preserved) we perceive that so rude a writer could hardly hope to do more than interest his contemporaries by his matter rather than his manner. Indeed, the literary quality of his thousand printed pages is inferior to that of "The Voiage and Travaile of Sir John Maundevile, Kt., which treateth of the way to Hierusalem, and of marvayles of Inde, with other ilands and countryes," written three hundred years before, in a period of depression in English literature. Smith and Maundevile were alike in their tendency to embellish and magnify the magna pars fui, and both made up by touches of romance for what they lacked in the sober field of history.

A passage from New England's Trials may be cited, as affording a fair example of Smith's method and style :

Here I must intreate a little your fauours to digresse. They did not kill the English because they were Christians, but for their weapons and commodities, they were rare nouelties; but now they feare we may beate them out of their dens, which Lions and Tygers would not admit but by force. But must this be an argument for an English man, or discourage any other in Virginia or New England? No: for I haue tried them both.

For Virginia, I kept that country with 38, and had not to eate but what we had from the sauages. When I had ten men able to go abroad, our common wealth was very strong: with such a number I ranged that vnknown country 14 weeks; I had but 18 to subdue them all, with which great army I stayed six weekes before their greatest Kings habitations, till they had gathered together all the power they could ; and yet the Dutch-men sent at a needlesse excessiue charge did helpe Powhatan how to betray me.

Of their numbers we were vncertaine ; but them two honorable gentlemen (Captaine George Percie and Captaine Francis West, two of the Phittiplaces, and some other such noble gentlemen and resolute spirits bore their shares with me, and now liuing in England) did see me take this murdering Opcehankanough now their great King by the long locke on his head ; with my pistole at his breast, I led him among his greatest forces, and before we parted made him fill our Bark of twenty Tuns with corne. When their owne wants was such, I haue giuen them part againe in pittie, and others haue bought it againe to plant their fields.

For wronging a souldier but the value of a peny, I haue caused Powhatam send his owne men to James Towne to receiue their punishment at my discretion. It is true in our greatest extremitie they shot me, slue three of my men, and by the folly of them that fled tooke me prisoner ; yet God made Pocahontas the Kings daughter the meanes to deliuer me : and thereby taught me to know their trecheries to preserue the rest.

It was also my chance in single combat to take the King of Paspahugh prisoner : and by keeping him, forced his subjects to worke in chaines till I made all the country pay contribution ; hauing little else whereon to liue.

Twise in this time I was their President, and none can say in all that time I had a man slaine : but for keeping them in that feare I was much blamed both there and here : yet I left 500 behind me that, through their confidence, in six months came most to confusion, as you may reade at large in the description of Virginia.

When I went first to these desperate designes, it cost me many a forgotten pound to hire men to go, and procrastination caused more run away than went. But after the ice was broken, came many braue voluntaries; notwithstanding since I came from thence, the honorable Company haue bin humble suiters to his Maiestic to get vagabands and condemned men to go thither; nay so much scorned was the name of Virginia, some did chuse to be hanged ere they would go thither, and were: yet for all the worst of spite, distraction, and discouragement, and this lamentable massacre, there is more honest men now suters to go, then cuer hath bin constrained knaues; and it is not vnknown to most men of understanding, how happie many of those Collumners doe thinke themselves, that they might be admitted, and yet pay for their passage to go now to Virginia: and had I but meanes to transport as many as would go, I might haue choise of 10000 that would gladly be in any of those new places, which were so basely contemned by vngrateful base minds.

To range this countrey of New England in like maner I had but eight, as is said, and amongst their brute conditions I met many of their silly incounters, and without any hurt, God be thanked; when your West country men were many of them wounded and much tormented with the sauages that assaulted their ship, as they did say themselves, in the first yeare I was there 1614; and though Master Hunt, then Master with me, did most basely in stealing some sauages from that coast to sel, when he was directed to haue gone for Spaine: yet that place was so remote from Capawuck, where Epenew should haue fraughted them with gold ore, his fault could be no cause of their bad successe, howeuer it is alledged for an excuse. I speake not this out of vain glory, as it may be some gleaners, or some was neuer there may censure me: but to let all men be assured by those examples, what those sauages are, that thus strangely doe murder and betray our countrey men.

Smith's works may be taken as samples of many

narrations of experiences and observations in the New World, written by numerous hands during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Some of these other recorders wrote better than Smith, some worse; it is enough to say that their chronicles—with the exception of a few which we shall next proceed to examine—deserve, like Smith's, attention from the antiquarian or the general historian, not from the historian of American literature.

The first chronicler of doings in New England—William Bradford—was a man unlike Smith in character. Instead of adventure, romance, brilliant personal exploits, excitement, and disquietude, there were in his life calmness, patience, perseverance, and faithful devotion to the duties of his station. As a cavalier, Bradford could make no figure at all comparable with Smith's; but if his natural capacities were smaller, his steadfastness and serenity were much greater. He was also master of a better English style.

William Bradford was born in March, 1588, in Austerfield, Yorkshire, that English district which has been the birthplace of not a few great men and sound reforms. A farmer's son, he never enjoyed that Cambridge education which served other early New Englanders in such good stead. The thoughtful boy adopted the Puritan faith, and was a member of John Robinson's congregation in Amsterdam, Holland. He was one of the company which sailed to Plymouth, Massachusetts, in the Mayflower, in 1620; and though, at the very beginning of Puritan settlement in the New World, Mrs. Bradford was drowned, her husband devoutly bowed to his God and went on with undiminished courage in his lonely work—until he married again. On April 5, 1621, he was elected second governor of Plymouth Colony. From this time until his death in 1657, Bradford was annually reelected every year save five, on which he declined to accept the burdensome honor. As chief magistrate, he wrought a good work for the young colony, by a union of firmness and gentleness, of foresight and common sense. The Indian problem was of course the one most urgently demanding solution. When a chief took advantage of a famine in the colony to send a bundle of arrows tied in a serpent's skin, Bradford returned the skin crammed with powder and bullets. But if Bradford knew how to be bold, he was equally skilled in the arts of diplomacy. His management of the affairs of his colony was discreet as regards its internal affairs, its relations towards its neighbors of Massachusetts Bay, and its obligations to the home government in England.

Bradford's claim to mention here, however, is based not upon his sagacious management of his little colony—which, though it preceded Massachusetts Bay in point of time, never equalled it in importance—but upon his "History of Plymouth Plantation," the principal one of his historical and doctrinal writings. This is a plain and straightforward record of the doings at Plymouth down to the year 1646. It chronicles those things which Bradford did or saw, and while it is always written from the standpoint of the Pilgrim Separatist, and with the interests of Plymouth constantly in view, it may fairly be called impartial. Its writer, though not a university man, had acquired a respectable education, and was a wide reader; and he was, therefore, able to tell his story in a more methodical and pleasing manner than is visible in any of Smith's books. Furthermore, Bradford was modest in the quaint Puritan fashion, with its curious union of spiritual exaltation and personal depreciation; and his record bears with it all the marks of credibility.

The story begins with an account of the evils of the prelatical system in the Church of England; details the commencement of Puritan separatism, after unavailing protest; presents a sad picture of Episcopal persecution of early Independents; and then proceeds to tell of the emigration to Holland in search of religious freedom, of the failure there, of the final transfer to the shores of Massachusetts, and of the establishment and career of the colony. Inspired by piety, the Pilgrims ever trusted in God, and Bradford's Pilgrim Anabasis is marked on every page with the signs of a spirit strong because devout. The comforts of religion were needed in the long battle for a foothold on the new soil; and Bradford, without abating his stern zeal, and indeed because of it, succeeds in interesting and profiting his readers. His book of annals, unlike most works in this useful but dreary department of book-making, can be read through without much weariness. For the critical reader it has some interest; for the political historian it is a very valuable document.

But Bradford's "History" is, after all, a document

merely. It contains pieces of good writing, yet on the whole it does not rise to the rank of historical literature. We must go to it before we can correctly analyze the noble character of the first settlers of Massachusetts; and in this historical and character study we may get, incidentally, some purely literary pleasure. But Bradford was a forerunner of literature, not a historian. He stands not as an early Palfrey or Bancroft, but ranks with the useful company of annalists, diarists, and autobiographers, few of whom have equalled him in strength of character and fidelity of purpose. He was the first Pilgrim writer in America, the first recorder of doings in New England, and a story-teller of considerable power, as well as of absolute truthfulness in matters of fact. New England may congratulate itself that its early settlements were described by Bradford and Winthrop in contemporary accounts as faithful and as truly original as the Anglo-Saxon chronicle, though in literary merit inferior to that plain masterpiece of early English.

This History makes evident some facts not yet generally familiar: that among the early Puritans were some mean fellows, criminals, jealous rivals, meddlesome intruders, and selfish money-makers. Plymouth, as he describes it, was a human community, with the imperfections of humanity. Now and then these faults and foibles Bradford describes with that sort of humor which is usually called "grim." A poetical flavor also appears, as in the description of the departure from Leyden: "So being ready to departe, they had a day of solleme humiliation, their pastor taking his texte from Ezra 8. 21, 'And there, at ye river, by Ahava, I proclaimed a fast, that we might humble ourselves before our God, and seeke of him a right way for us, and for our children, and for all our substance.' Upon which he spent a good parte of ye day very profitably, and suitable to their presente occasion. The rest of the time was spent in powering out prairs to ye Lord with great fervencie, mixed with abundance of tears. And ye time being come when they must departe, they were accompanied with most of their brethren out of ye citie, unto a towne sundrie miles of called Delfes-Haven, wher the ship lay ready to receive them. So they lefte yt goodly & pleasante citie, which had been ther resting place near 12. years ; but they knew they were pilgrimes, & looked not much on those things, but lift up their eyes to ye heavens, their dearest cuntrie, and quieted their spirits." This little passage, perhaps the gem in Bradford's writings, is high and true, and is poetical prose, even in the unconscious humor of the phrase : " upon which he spent a good part of the day very profitably." Is there not in it the spirit, and something of the style, of Milton's prose, later in the seventeenth century? Milton (whose prose, even in the " Areopagitica," is so far inferior to his poetry) need not have been ashamed of Bradford's introductory words :

Of Plimoth Plantation.—And first of ye occasion and indūsments there unto ; the which that I may truly unfould, I must begine at ye very roote & rise of ye same. The which I shall endeavor to manefest in a plaine stile, with singuler regard unto ye simple trueth in all things, at least as near as my slender judgement can attaine the same.

1. Chapter.—It is well knowne unto ye godly and judicious, how ever since ye first breaking out of ye lighte of ye gospell in our Honourable Nation of England, (which was ye first of nations whom ye Lord adorned ther with, affter yt grosse darknes of popery which had covered & overspred ye Christian worled,) what warrs & oppossions ever since, Satan hath raised, maintained, and continued against the Saints, from time to time, in one sorte or other. Some times by bloody death and cruell torments; other whiles imprisonments, banishments, & other hard usages; as being loath his kingdom should goe downe, the trueth prevaile, and ye churches of God revert to their anciente puritie, and recover their primative order, libertie, and bewtie. But when he could not prevaile by these means against the maine trueths of ye gospell, but that they began to take rooting in many places, being watered with ye blooud of ye martires, and blessed from heaven with a gracious encrease; he then begane to take him to his anciente strategemes, used of old against the first Christians. That when by ye bloody & barbarous persecutions of ye Heathen Emperours, he could not stoppe and subuerte the course of ye gospell, but that it speedily overspread with a wonderfull celeritie the then best known parts of ye world, he then began to sow errours, heresies, and wounderfull dissentions amongst ye professours themselves (working upon their pride & ambition, with other corrupte passions incident to all mortall men, yea to ye saints them selves in some measure,) by which wofull effects followed; as not only bitter contentions, & hart burnings, schismes, with other horrible confusions, but Satan tooke occasion & advantage therby to foyst in a number of vile ceremoneys, with many unprofitable canons and decrees, which have since been as snares to many poore & peaceable souls, even to this day.

Bradford then mentions the persecutions of Christians by heathen, and of "orthodoxe & true Christians" by "Arians & other their complices"; says nothing of orthodox persecution of Arianism; and declares that "when as yt old serpente could not prevaile by those firie flames & other his cruell tragedies, which he by his instruments put in use every wher in ye days of queene Mary & before, he then begane an other kind of warre, and went more closly to worke; not only to oppuggen, but even to ruinate & destroy ye kingdom of Christ, by more secrete and subtile means, by kindling ye flames of contention and sowing ye seeds of discord & bitter enmitie amongst ye proffessors and seeming reformed them selves." The controversy, in Bradford's opinion, was between "ye ceremonies, & servise-booke, and other popish antichristian stuffe, the plague of England to this day, which are like ye high-places in Israell," and "ye right worship of God & discipline of Christ established in ye church, according to ye simplicitie of ye gospell, without the mixture of mens inventions, . . . ruled by ye laws of Gods word, dispensed in those offices, & by those officers of Pastors, Teachers, & Elders, &c. according to ye Scripturs." *

* Pp. 1-4 of "History of Plymouth Plantation," by William Bradford, the second governor of the colony. Now first printed from the original manuscript for the Massachusetts Historical Society. [Edited by Charles Deane.] Boston: Published for the Society by Little, Brown, & Co., 1856.

This book can itself boast a romantic history. Never printed in the author's day, Nathaniel Morton, Bradford's nephew, used large parts of it in "New England's Memorial," 1669; Thomas Prince employed it in his "Chronological History of New England"; Thomas Hutchinson quoted it in the "History of Massachusetts Bay"; it was stolen from Prince's library

No wonder that Bradford eloquently exclaimed, after the rise of the commonwealth in England :

Full little did I think that the downfall of the bishops, with their courts, canons, and ceremonies, had been so near when I first began this writing, which was about the year 1630, and so pieced at leisure times afterwards, or that I should have lived to have seen or heard of the same. But it is the Lord's doing, and ought to be marvellous in our eyes. "Every plant which mine heavenly Father hath not planted," saith our Saviour, "shall be rooted up." "I have snared thee, and thou art taken, O Babel (bishops), and thou wast not aware: thou art found and also caught, because thou hast striven against the Lord." But will they needs strive against the truth, against the servants of the Lord, what! and against the Lord himself? Do they provoke the Lord to anger? Are they stronger than he? No, no, they have met with their match. Behold, I come against thee, O proud men, saith the Lord God of hosts; for thy day is coming, even the time that I will visit thee. May not the people of God now say, and these poor people among the rest: The Lord hath brought forth our righteousness: come, let us declare in Zion the work of the Lord our God. Let all flesh be still before the Lord, for he is raised up out of his holy place.

This poor people may say among the thousands of Israel, When the Lord brought again the captivity of Zion, we were like them that dream. The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we rejoice. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. They went weeping and carried precious seed; but they shall return with joy, and bring their sheaves.

in the Old South Church, Boston, by British troops during the Revolution; Alexander Young found a copy of a part of it, in Morton's handwriting, in the records of the First Church, Plymouth, about 1835; and finally the whole was discovered in 1855, in the Bishop of London's library at Fulham.

Do ye not now see the fruits of your labors, O all ye servants of the Lord that have suffered for his truth, and have been faithful witnesses of the same? And ye little handful amongst the rest, the least amongst the thousands of Israel? You have not had a seed-time, but many of you have seen a joyful harvest. Should ye not then rejoice, yea, again rejoice, and say, Hallelujah, salvation, and glory, and honor, and power, be to the Lord our God; for true and righteous are his judgments.

But thou wilt ask, What is the matter? What is done? Why art thou a stranger in Israel, that thou shouldest not know what is done? Are not those Jebusites overcome, that have vexed the people of Israel so long, even holding Jerusalem even until David's days, and been as thorns in their sides for many ages, and now began to scorn that not any David should meddle with them; they began to fortify their tower, as that of the old Babylonians. But these proud Anakims are now thrown down, and their glory laid in the dust. The tyrannous bishops are ejected, their courts dissolved, their canons forceless, their service-books cashiered, their ceremonies useless and despised, their plots for Popery prevented, and all their superstitions discarded, and returned to Rome, from whence they came; and the monuments of idolatry rooted out of the land, and the proud and profane supporters and cruel defenders of these, as bloody papists, wicked atheists, and their malignant consorts, marvellously overthrown. And are not these great things? Who can deny it?

But who hath done it? Even he that sitteth on the white horse, who is called Faithful and True, and judgeth and fighteth righteously, whose garments are dipped in blood, and his name was called The Word of God; for he shall rule them with a rod of iron; for it is he that treadeth the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God; and he hath upon his garment and upon his thigh a name written, The King of Kings and Lord of Lords. Hallelujah! *

Bradford, who died May 9, 1657, did not live to see the restoration of the Church of England, and of kingly government.

It is easy enough to accuse Bradford of bitterness and bigotry; and moralizers at his expense may record the fact that the ancient church transferred from Holland to Plymouth, has become Unitarian, like nearly all the churches established by the Pilgrims and Puritans in Massachusetts. But we cannot lay down his writings without feeling that we have been in the presence of a strong, sincere, and useful man.

Edward Winslow, whose writings are entitled to a brief consideration, was a fellow-passenger of Bradford's on the famous voyage of the Mayflower. He was the author of several books of his own, and part-writer of a journal kept in conjunction with the more famous author of the History of Plymouth Plantation. Winslow was a native of Worcestershire, Edward Winslow, 1595-1655. England, and was but twenty-five years old when he emigrated to America,—not half as old as Elder William Brewster, and younger than either Robinson or Bradford. Like so many of the Pilgrims and Puritans, he could boast of good birth, if he cared to do so. After receiving a fair education, he adopted Puritan principles at an early age, like Bradford, and joined the congregation at Leyden through the influence of its pastor, John Robinson, in 1617. By the time the Mayflower sailed he had married. The resemblance between the fortunes of Winslow and Bradford is also to be noted in that Winslow's wife died within a few months after her arrival at Plymouth, as by the record for March 24, 1621: "Dies Elizabeth, the wife of Mr. Edward Winslow." On May 12th the cheerful widower—who doubtless would have regarded as doomed to perdition one who acted in, or even read, George Chapman's play of "The Widdowes Teares"—was the subject of the following record in Bradford and Winslow's Journal: "1621, May 12. The first marriage in this place is of Mr. Edward Winslow, to Mrs. Susanna White, widow of Mr. William White,"—who had died February 21st, previous. This disgraceful union was the first marriage in New England.

* Bradford (spelling modernized), quoted by Nathaniel Morton (1669), in "An Introduction to the Ecclesiastical History of the Church of Christ at Plymouth, in New England."—The text cited is that given in Alexander Young's "Chronicles of the Pilgrim Fathers of the Colony of Plymouth, from 1602 to 1625." Boston, 1841.

Winslow early became prominent in the affairs of the young colony, to which he made himself useful in several ways, not the least of which was the winning of the trust and esteem of the Indian chief Massasoit, whom he succeeded in curing from disease in 1623. In that year Winslow sailed for England as agent of Plymouth Colony, and on his return, brought with him the first live stock. A second voyage and brief stay in England soon followed, and in 1633 Winslow was elected governor of the colony. His greatest diplomatic work, accomplished with no small adroitness, was his appearance before the Council in 1635, where he secured a renewal of the conditions of self-government at Plymouth, endangered by the machinations of persons inimical to the enterprise. But Thomas Morton, the royalist and Episcopalian—of whom we shall presently hear more—secured Winslow's imprisonment in the Fleet, on various charges of alleged law-breaking. Emerging, Winslow was again elected governor in 1636 and 1644, and finally quit Plymouth in 1649, finding enough to do in England under the Cromwellian regime. On May 8, 1655, when on his way to the West Indies, under authority from the Protector, as one of three commissioners to attack Spanish settlements, Winslow died of a fever, and was buried at sea near Jamaica. His career in America and elsewhere was only less romantic than John Smith's, and on the whole was quite as useful.

Winslow was a sufficiently modest chronicler of his sights and doings, his best work—though not his most ambitious—being the journal which he wrote in connection with William Bradford. This journal covers the period from September 6, 1620, before the landing at Plymouth, to the autumn of 1621; and on the whole it is well done, though with little pretence to fine or very careful writing. Truth is everywhere apparent in the record; and the intensity of the writers seldom interfered with their common-sense and discretion. The perils and pleasures of the enterprise; the terrors of Indian warfare; the weather; the appearance and mission of the Indian chief Massasoit; the exploration of the country, and similar matters, are described briefly, clearly, and with some spirit. These Pilgrims had sharp eyes, and this journal contains many a vivid picture of savage life on the new shore. Common and faithful diarizing need not be asked to do more than does the following account of the first visit from "Massasoit," which is a fair sample of early colonial methods in dealing with the Indians :

Thursday, the 22d of March [1621], was a very fair, warm day. About noon we met again about our public business. But we had scarce been an hour together, but Samoset came again, and Squanto, the only native of Patuxet, where we now inhabit, who was one of the twenty captives that by Hunt were carried away, and had been in England, and dwelt in Cornhill with Master John Slanie, a merchant, and could speak a little English, with three others; and they brought with them some few skins to truck, and some red herrings, newly taken and dried, but not salted; and signified unto us, that their great sagamore, Masasoyt was hard by, with Quadequina, his brother, and all their men. They could not well express in English what they would; but after an hour the king came to the top of a hill over against us, and had in his train sixty men, that we could well behold them, and they us. We were not willing to send our governor to them, and they were unwilling to come to us. So Squanto went again unto him, and brought word that we should send one to parley with him, which we did, which was Edward Winsloe, to know his mind, and to signify the mind and will of our governor, which was to have trading and peace with him. We sent to the king a pair of knives, and a copper chain with a jewel at it. To Quadequina we sent likewise a knife, and a jewel to hang in his ear, and withal a pot of strong water, a good quantity of biscuit, and some butter; which were all willingly accepted.

Our messenger made a speech unto him, that King James saluted him with words of love and peace, and did accept of him as his friend and ally; and that our governor desired to see him and to truck with him, and to confirm a piece with him, as his next neighbor. He liked well of the speech, and heard it attentively, though the interpreters did not well express it. After he had eaten and drunk himself, and given the rest to his company, he looked upon our messenger's sword and armor, which he had on, with intimation of his desire to buy it; but, on the other side, our messenger showed his unwillingness to part with it. In the end, he left him in the custody of Quadequina, his brother, and came over the brook, and some twenty men following him, leaving all their bows and arrows behind them. We kept six or seven as hostages for our messenger. Captain Standish and Master Williamson met the king at the brook, with half a dozen musketeers. They saluted him, and he them; so one going over, the one on the one side, and the other on the other, conducted him to a house then in building, where we placed a green rug and three or four cushions. Then instantly came our governor, with drum and trumpet after him, and some few musketeers. After salutations, our governor kissing his hand, the king kissed him; and so they sat down. The governor called for some strong water, and drank to him, and he drank a great draught, that make him sweat all the while after. He called for a little fresh meat, which the king did eat willingly, and did give his followers. Then they treated of peace, which was:

1. That neither he nor any of his should injure or do hurt to any of our people.

2. And if any of his did hurt to any of ours, he should send the offender, that we might punish him.

3. That if any of our tools were taken away, when our people were at work, he should cause them to be restored; and if ours did any harm to any of his, we would do the like to them.

4. If any did unjustly war against him, we would aid him; if any did war against us, he should aid us.

5. He should send to his neighbor confederates to certify them of this, that they might not wrong us, but might be likewise comprised in the conditions of peace.

6. That when their men came to us, they should leave their bows and arrows behind them, as we should do our pieces when we came to them.

Lastly, that doing thus, King James would esteem of him as his friend and ally.

All which the king seemed to like well, and it was applauded of his followers. All the while he sat by the governor, he trembled for fear. In his person he is a very lusty man, in his best years, an able body, grave of countenance, and spare of speech; in his attire little or nothing differing from the rest of his followers, only in a great chain of white bone beads about his neck; and at it, behind his neck, hangs a little bag of tobacco, which he drank, and gave us to drink. His face was painted with a sad, red-like murrey, and oiled both head and face, that he looked greasily. All his followers likewise were in their faces, in part or in whole, painted, some black, some red, some yellow, and some white, some with crosses and other antic works; some had skins on them, and some naked; all tall, strong men in appearance.

So, after all was done, the governor conducted him to the brook, and there they embraced each other, and he departed; we diligently keeping our hostages. We expected our messenger's coming; but anon word was brought us that Quadequina was coming, and our messenger was stayed till his return; who presently came, and a troop with him. So likewise we entertained him, and conveyed him to the place prepared. He was very fearful of our pieces, and made signs of dislike, that they should be carried away; whereupon commandment was given they should be laid away. He was a very proper, tall young man, of a very modest and seemly countenance, and he did kindly like of our entertainment. So we conveyed him likewise, as we did the king; but divers of their people stayed still. When he was returned, then they dismissed our messenger. Two of his people would have stayed all night, but we would not suffer it. One thing I forgot; the king had in his bosom, hanging in a string, a great long knife. He marvelled much at our trumpet, and some of his men would sound it as well as they could. Samoset and Squanto, they stayed all night with us; and the king and all his men lay all night in the woods, not above half an English mile from us, and all their wives and women with them. They said that within eight or nine days they would come and set corn on the other side of the brook, and dwell there all summer; which is hard by us. That night we kept good watch; but there was no appearance of danger.*

It was a fashion, in accounts of New England colonization, prepared for English readers, to add some sponsor's, or some fictitious, name to the work. Thus the address prefixed to Bradford and Winslow's narrative was signed by "G. Mourt," perhaps George Morton, Bradford's brother-in-law. From this contraction or misprint the work was long called "Mourt's Relation."

Of Winslow's other writings, prepared without aid from any other hand, were a "Letter sent from New England to a Friend in these parts, setting forth a brief and true declaration of the worth of that plantation, as also certain useful directions for such as intend a voyage into those parts"; and the two more considerable works whose titles follow:

"Good Newes from New England; or a true Relation of things very remarkable at the Plantation of Plimoth in New-England." This was printed in London in 1624, and contains sixty-six pages. Its style is plainer and less picturesque than that of Bradford and Winslow's Journal; it describes the perils and progress of the colonists, with some account of the Indians with whom they had to deal, and a statement of the agricultural and commercial prospects of the settlement. The chapters under the two latter heads are the best, being sensible and straightforward statements, such as were needed in England at the time.

“Hypocrisie Vnmasked: By a true Relation of the Proceedings of the Governour and Company of the Massachusets against Samuel Gorton (and his Accomplices,) . . . Whereunto is added a Briefe Narration (occasioned by certain aspersions) of the true grounds or cause of the first Planting of New England; the Precedents of their Churches in the way and worship of God; their Communion with the Reformed Churches; and their practise toward those that dissent from them in matters of Religion and Church Government.” London, 1646.

Gorton was a fanatic and mischief-maker who sorely vexed Plymouth, Newport, and Boston in the early half of the seventeenth century, and finally ended his career in Rhode Island, in 1677. Winslow's account of him has no present interest; but the appended relation of the “first planting of New England” is solidly written, and has some substantial value. An account of Christian work among New England Indians, a “platform of church discipline,” etc., were additional writings by Winslow. The old colonist's portrait—the only representation of one of the Mayflower's passengers—shows a dignified, solid, and thoughtful countenance, well indexing the character of one who, though scarcely a man of letters, belonged to that noteworthy group of chroniclers who treasured up the records of the early deeds of the settlers of Massachusetts.

By unusual good fortune, it happened that the governors of both Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay left full records of the doings of the colonies under their charge. These records are, as we have said, indispensable to the historical student, and rather interesting to the general reader. Governor John Winthrop's "History of New England" is, on the whole, less graphic and picturesque than Governor William Bradford's "History of Plymouth Plantation"; but it has a smoother and more finished style.

John Winthrop was a native of Suffolk, England, and was born in Groton on January 12, 1587. His father was a lawyer in the metropolis, and the family was one of honorable name and descent. John Winthrop, 1587-1649. Winthrop, like so many of the Puritan leaders, was a Cambridge man, studying at Trinity College, but losing his degree because of his early marriage. He chose the legal profession, became a justice of the peace, adopted Puritan principles, and became governor of the Massachusetts Bay Company, in England, at the age of forty-two. The ancestral estate in Suffolk was sold soon after; and in 1630 Winthrop and nine hundred colonists, in seventeen vessels, sailed for New England. Among his companions were several who were destined to colonial prominence: Isaac Johnson and his wife, the Lady

Arbella, Thomas Dudley, and Simon Bradstreet. The industrious Winthrop beguiled the tedium of the voyage by writing a booklet called "A Model of Christian Charity." The landing was at Salem, in June, but the settlement and church, with Rev. John Wilson as pastor, were ultimately started at Charlestown, and thence transferred to Boston in September, 1630. Winthrop was the leading spirit from the first, and was repeatedly chosen governor by a sort of natural right. In 1636 Sir Harry Vane supplanted him in that office, and a few other years he did not serve, but he was chief magistrate the greater part of the time until his death. Early in 1649 Winthrop established and maintained relations, on the whole, friendly, with Plymouth, the Indians, and the home government, and his management of the affairs of the colony was successful, though the Antinomians or Hutchinsonians were vexatious, and certain sharp jealousies existed between Massachusetts Bay and Plymouth—jealousies in which the greater blame belonged to the former. Neither Massachusetts nor Plymouth was free from back-bitings, burnings, scramblings for selfish advantage, and the other ills that infest new settlements; and they were annoyed by those fanatics who always hang upon any reform movement. With them, also, had come a low criminal class. Their success was largely due to the efficiency and discretion of their governors, whose modest records tell us both of trouble and of triumph. To say that Winthrop's strong and well-balanced character was marred by occasional superstition and intolerance, is but to say that he was human, and a seventeenth-century Puritan.

Winthrop's brief treatise, "A Model of Christian Charity," written on shipboard, need not long detain the literary student. It was one of the many religious tracts produced during the Puritan revival in England and America, and it surpassed some of its fellows in spirit and execution. It applied particularly to the future work of the Massachusetts settlers, whom it advised to be self-sacrificing, patient, and liberal, working fraternally for the general welfare. Had its counsels been more strictly heeded, the colony would have escaped some of its faults and trials. Winthrop was an intelligent man, and familiar with some part of the English literature of his day; thus he called George Wither "our modern spirit of poetry"; and he did not do discredit to the general spirit of intelligence which pervaded the Puritan movement. His letters—even those of affection—were written in a somewhat stately style, and abounded in religious allusions and Biblical quotations. The literary style of the leading settlers of New England, it may be said here, was materially indebted to their familiarity with the grandeur and poetry of the Bible. They were well acquainted with the Geneva version, and the King James' translation had recently appeared. The letters of the Puritans almost seemed like copies of the New Testament epistles, so full were they of counsels, prayers, and benedictions.

The work bearing the somewhat ambitious title of "The History of New England" is only one of those diaries which were common in the seventeenth century. Winthrop's theme was of lasting importance, and his treatment of it was, of course, intelligent. His spirit was, on the whole, just and tolerant, special praise belonging to his accounts of his difficulties with rivals in office and influence. The record begins "Anno Domini, 1630, March 29, Monday," the day after Easter: "Riding at the Cowes, near the Isle of Wight, in the Arbella, a ship of three hundred and fifty tons, whereof Capt. Peter Milborne was master, being manned with fifty-two seamen, and twenty-eight pieces of ordnance, (the wind coming to the N. by W. the evening before,) in the morning there came aboard us Mr. Cradock, the late governor, and the masters of his two ships, Capt. John Lowe, master of the Ambrose, and Mr. Nicholas Hurlston, master of the Jewel, and Mr. Thomas Beecher, master of the Talbot, (which three ships rode then by us,—the Charles, the Mayflower, the William and Francis, the Hopewell, the Whale, the Success, and the Trial being still at Hampton and not ready,) when, upon conference, it was agreed, that (in regard it was uncertain when the rest of the fleet would be ready) these four ships should consort together; the Arbella to be admiral, the Talbot vice-admiral, the Ambrose rear-admiral, and the Jewel a captain; and accordingly articles of consortship were drawn between the said captains and masters; whereupon Mr. Cradock took leave of us, and our captain gave him a farewell with four or five shot." Thus minutely—though usually in more graceful English than this—Winthrop carries his chronicle to

November 11, 1648, a little more than four months before his death. The work, as has already been said, is a diary, not properly a history; and it includes whatever would naturally be entered in the diary of a public man in a little state: meteorological accounts during the ocean voyage; the appearance of Massachusetts on landing; descriptions of notable deeds and days, religious and political; losses and gains of the colonists; accidents and peculiar experiences; trials, executions, and minor punishments; ecclesiastical and doctrinal discussions, etc. The governor's half-superstitious belief in "special providences" appears quite frequently, and the diary closes with the story of the drowning of a child in a well in a cellar, on a Sunday evening, while the parents were visiting a neighbor. On the previous evening, too, the father had "wrought an hour within night," so that the Sabbath was broken on any theory. "The father, freely in the open congregation, did acknowledge it the righteous hand of God for his profaning his holy day against the checks of his own conscience." Just before this is an account of the drowning of two children while their parents were at the lecture [sermon]. "The parents had no more sons, and confessed they had been too indulgent toward him, and had set their hearts over much upon him."

But Governor Winthrop's mind was not a petty one. Its largeness was never better shown than in his magnum opus, the speech made by him in 1645, after he had been vindicated from the charge that he had gone beyond his rights as deputy-governor

(Dudley being governor). This "little speech," as Winthrop modestly called it, was evidently prepared and revised with care. It was delivered in the meeting-house, after the "lecture," in presence of magistrates, deputies, and people. Its terseness and distinctly Puritan ability, as well as its place in time, entitle it to complete presentation here :

I suppose something may be expected from me, upon this charge that is befallen me, which moves me to speak now to you ; yet I intend not to intermeddle in the proceedings of the court or with any of the persons concerned therein. Only I bless God, that I see an issue of this troublesome business. I also acknowledge the justice of the court, and, for mine own part, I am well satisfied, I was publicly charged, and I am publicly and legally acquitted, which is all I did expect or desire. And though this be sufficient for my justification before men, yet not so before the God, who hath seen so much amiss in my dispensations (and even in this affair) as calls me to be humble. For to be publicly and criminally charged in this court, is matter of humiliation, (and I desire to make a right use of it,) notwithstanding I be thus acquitted. If her father had spit in her face, (saith the Lord concerning Miriam,) should she not have been ashamed seven days? Shame had lien upon her, whatever the occasion had been. I am unwilling to stay you from your urgent affairs, yet give me leave (upon this special occasion) to speak a little more to this assembly. It may be of some good use, to inform and rectify the judgments of some of the people, and may prevent such distempers as have arisen among us. The great questions that have troubled the country, are about the authority of the magistrates and the liberty of the people. It is yourselves who have called us to this office, and being called by you, we have our authority from God, in way of an ordinance, such as hath the image of God eminently stamped upon it, the contempt and violation whereof hath been vindicated with examples of divine vengeance. I entreat you to consider, that when you chose magistrates, you take them from among yourselves, men subject to like passions as you are. Therefore, when you see infirmities in us, you should reflect upon your own, and that would make you bear the more with us, and not be severe censurers of the failings of your magistrates, when you have continual experience of the like infirmities in yourselves and others. We account him a good servant, who breaks not his covenant. The covenant between you and us is the oath you have taken of us, which is to this purpose, that we shall govern you and judge your causes by the rules of God's law and our own, according to our best skill. When you agree with a workman to build you a ship or house, etc., he undertakes as well for his skill as for his faithfulness, for it is his profession, and you pay him for both. But when you call one to be a magistrate, he doth not profess nor undertake to have sufficient skill for that office, nor can you furnish him with gifts, etc., therefore, you must run the hazard of his skill and ability. But if he fail in faithfulness, which by his oath he is bound unto, that he must answer for. If it fall out that the case be clear to common apprehension, and the rule clear also, if he transgress here, the error is not in the skill, but in the evil of the will: it must be required of him. But if the case be doubtful, or the rule doubtful, to men of such understanding and parts as your magistrates are, if your magistrates should err here, yourselves must bear it.

For the other point concerning liberty, I observe a great mistake in the country about that. There is a two-fold liberty, natural (I mean as our nature is now corrupt), and civil or federal. The first is common to man with beasts, and other creatures. By this, man as he stands in relation to man simply, hath liberty to do what he lists; it is a liberty to evil as well as to good. This liberty is incompatible and inconsistent with authority, and cannot endure the least restraint of the most just authority. The exercise and maintaining of this liberty makes men grow more evil, and in time to be worse than brute beasts: omnes sumus licentia deteriores. This is that great enemy of truth and peace, that wild beast, which all the ordinances of God are bent against, to restrain and subdue it. The other kind of liberty I call civil or federal; it may also be termed moral, in reference to the covenant between God and man in the moral law, and the politic covenants and constitutions amongst men themselves. This liberty is the proper end and object of authority, and cannot subsist without it; and it is a liberty to do that only which is good, just, and honest. This liberty you are to stand for, with the hazard (not only of your goods, but) of your lives, if need be. Whatsoever crosseth this, is not authority, but a distemper thereof. This liberty is maintained and exercised in a way of subjection to authority; it is of the same kind of liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. The woman's own choice makes such a man her husband; yet being so chosen, he is her lord, and she is to be subject to him, yet in a way of liberty, not of bondage; and a true wife accounts her subjection her honor and freedom, and would not think her condition safe and free, but in her subjection to her husband's authority. Such is the liberty of the church under the authority of Christ, her king and husband; his yoke is so easy and sweet to her as a bride's ornaments; and if through frowardness or wantonness, etc., she shake it off, at any time, she is at no rest in her spirit, until she take it up again; and whether her lord smiles upon her, and embraceth her in his arms, or whether he frowns, or rebukes, or smites her, she apprehends the sweetness of his love in all, and is refreshed, supported, and instructed by every such dispensation of his authority over her. On the other side, ye know who they are that complain of this yoke and say, Let us break their bands, etc., we will not have this man rule over us. Even so, brethren, it will be between you and your magistrates. If you stand for your natural corrupt liberties, and will do what is good in your own eyes, you will not endure the least weight of authority, but will murmur, and oppose, and be always striving to shake off that yoke; but if you will be satisfied to enjoy such civil and lawful liberties, such as Christ allows you, then will you quietly and cheerfully submit unto that authority which is set over you, in all the administrations of it, for your good. Wherein, if we fail at any time, we hope we shall be willing (by God's assistance) to hearken to good advice from any of you, or in any other way of God; so shall your liberties be preserved, in upholding the honor and power of authority amongst you.*

The character of Winthrop somewhat resembled that of Washington: both were discreetly aristocratic, ruled wisely and conservatively, and benefited the state more than sensational or radical minds could have done. Both were unjustly accused of showing an unduly monarchical spirit, but both triumphed, and were afterward held in affectionate veneration. Winthrop—mild, firm, politic, brave—was well entitled to his election, September 7, 1643, to that almost prophetic office, President of the United Colonies of New England.

The present discussion of the most significant books by early descriptive and historical writers would be incomplete without a few words concerning two peculiar productions, delineating primitive New England society from a critical, as well as a descriptive, point of view.

The first of these, "The New England Canaan,"* was written by that jovial individual, Thomas Morton, Thomas Morton, — 1646. whose excesses and extravagances at Merry Mount, near Boston, so scandalized his stern Puritan neighbors that they resorted to military attack, arrest, trial, and banishment, to be rid of him. In this book the author had a very practical purpose; to glorify the soil and capabilities of New England, and the peaceableness of the Indians; to ridicule and denounce the doctrines and practices of the Puritans; and thereby to vex and hinder them by enlisting against them the active hostility of Archbishop Laud and other powers in England. Morton, like the Gorges colonists in Maine, was an Anglican, and wished to see the Church of England in control of the new land, which belonged to it, he thought, by divine and governmental right, and by priority of settlement. The book, printed at Amsterdam or London in 1637, had some small influence at home, but did not circulate in New England, where it could not be found even as an argument against Morton when the Puritans tried him in 1644.

Morton gave some glowing descriptions of the physical conditions of Massachusetts, but chiefly devoted himself to the delineation of what he deemed religious heresies and social absurdities. He liked the land, but hated its occupants, and envied them their charter, which he wished to have revoked. In views of religious practice, governmental obligation, and social polity, Morton and the Puritans had nothing in common, and the last part of his book is a rough and violent presentation of this fact. In his serious statements he is very careless, and in his lampoons wild and irregular. For a true account of Morton and his followers one must go to Hawthorne's story, "The Maypole of Merry Mount," or to John Lothrop Motley's meritorious though forgotten novel, "Merry Mount." When all has been said that can be said in his favor, it must be admitted that he and his band were not men of the sort desirable when a state is to be established. He praised Indians, and lived with them happily, but his influence upon them was not salutary; his fanciful description of the country had, and would have, no effect upon its colonization by men of his own way of thinking; and his strictures on Puritan "tenents and practice" failed of their purpose. One is sorry for his apologies for what he calls "harmless mirth," but can hardly wonder that the happy-go-lucky colonist and his book perished in obscurity and failure. The "goodly groves of trees, dainty, fine, round, rising hillocks; delicate, fair, large plains; sweet crystal fountains, and clear running streams, that twine in fine meanders through the meads . . . fowls in abundance, fish in multitude, . . . millions of turtle-doves on the green boughs, which sat picking of the full, ripe, pleasant grapes," made the land seem to him "paradise;" but this paradise (of which even the hard-working Puritans were ignorant) was not for the fanciful historian of "The New England Canaan."

A counterpart to Morton's "New England Canaan" is to be found in "The Simple Cobbler of Agawam Nathaniel in America," by Nathaniel Ward. Morton, 1570-1653. Ward was a staunch adherent of Laud and Anglicanism, though his defence of them could hardly be called discreet, nor his illustration of Church of England principles attractive. Ward, at first an eccentric Essex parson of the Church of England, knew Laud well, having been frequently summoned before that august prelate, and finally excommunicated by him. After this he naturally turned still more eagerly toward the Puritans, and was a resident of Massachusetts from 1634 to 1646. At the time of his arrival he was more than sixty years old, a Cambridge graduate, well-travelled, and familiar with both London life and rural life in England. In Massachusetts he was prominent as settler of towns, law-maker, and preacher. His first American parish was at Agawam (now Ipswich), mentioned in the title of his best-known book. On his return to England he took part in the politics of the Commonwealth, and died a minister in his old Essex, over eighty years of age.

- The "Simple Cobbler," "by Theodore de la Guard," was printed in London just after Ward's return to England, but had been written during the last year or two of his American life. Its purpose, as expressed by the nominal writer on the title-page, was "to help mend his native country, lamentably tattered, both in the upper leather and sole, with all the honest stitches he can take ; and as willing never to be paid for his work by old English wonted pay. It is his trade to patch all the year long gratis. Therefore, I pray, gentlemen, keep your purses." This early New England Sartor Resartus spoke freely that which he thought, and satirized sharply those thoughts, words, and deeds, in Old and New England, which he deemed harmful. He was not always polished, temperate, consistent, fair, or even funny ; but he contrived to say some things effectively and nearly all things plainly, notwithstanding a cumbrous, punning, and pedantic style. He was a pseudo Hans Sachs in prose, talking from his cobbler's bench, and trying to mend manners and morals. This literary device, however, proved rather burdensome, and was not constantly kept in mind.

Ward felt that he was writing in earthquaking times, and he outspoke as a warning guide and prophet. A theoretical believer in religious and political freedom, he was as much afraid of anarchy and free-thought as he was of priestcraft and oppression. He wanted to whip others, while saving his own back. The moral which the Anglican drew from the book must have been : See what your Puritanism amounts to ! Ward's moral was : Crush dissent from our dissent ; make our social laws still more rigid. He goes so far, indeed, that we half believe the whole thing a reductio ad absurdum, written in the interests of episcopacy and monarchy. "I am not tolerant," he seems to shout to his English accusers ; "I am as anxious to get rid of those who disagree with me, as you are to get rid of me."

“Polypietty is the greatest impiety in the world”—this last sentence is from the book itself. “He that is willing to tolerate any religion or discrepant way of religion, besides his own, unless it be in matters merely indifferent, either doubts of his own, or is not sincere in it. He that is willing to tolerate any unsound opinion, that his own may also be tolerated, though never so sound, will for a need hang God’s Bible at the Devil’s girdle,” and so on, in various furious metaphors. Ward evidently delighted to expand and expound Article XVIII. of the Church of England. We need not lumber our pages with quotations from the “Cobbler,” whose wrath gains strength by going; as Professor Nichol neatly says: * “We are half inclined to suspect Mr. Ward of playing Mephistopheles, like Defoe in his ‘Short Way with the Dissenters.’” But it was more than a joke, this Puritan insistence on the right to say to Royalist and Puritan, to Anglican and Separatist: “Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther.” Ward carried his censorship even to matters of men’s and women’s dress, and here he is more amusing and perhaps a little less angry. Had he restrained his religious polemics and enlarged his social satire, his book would be better worth reading to-day.

We now reach the name of the first American book-maker—the prototype of hundreds of industrious men, most of whose names and deeds we shall not have the honor of considering in the volumes of this work. Nathaniel Morton, however, deserves a word as our pioneer in a harmless and even useful line of labor. Morton, though of English family, was born at Leyden, the seat of the church transported to Plymouth in 1620, and came to America at the age of ten. Governor Bradford's wife was Morton's aunt, and the youth early made himself useful to the governor. He was elected secretary of Plymouth Colony every year from 1647 to 1685, when he died; and of course he became thoroughly informed concerning major and minor local history. The bulk of the Plymouth records for half a century are in his handwriting.

In Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1669, there was "printed by S. G. and M. J., for John Vsher of Boston," the first published history of New England, compiled by Morton at the suggestion of the commissioners of the United Colonies. Its title-page was prepared in the stately and voluminous fashion of those days: "New England's Memorial; or, A brief relation of the most memorable and remarkable passages of the providence of God, manifested to the planters of New-England in America; with special reference to the first colony thereof, called New-Plimouth. As also a nomination of divers of the most eminent instruments deceased, both of church and commonwealth, improved in the first beginning and after progress of sundry of the respective jurisdictions in those parts; in reference unto sundry exemplary passages of their lives, and the time of their death. Published for the use and benefit of present and future generations, by Nathaniel Morton, secretary to the court, for the jurisdiction of New-Plimouth." Then follow three texts from the Old Testament. The book proved to have the use and benefit claimed, for editions were printed in England and America as late as 1855, the very year of the recovery of the Bradford manuscript.

Morton's chief sources were Bradford's history and Winslow's diary. To these he made acknowledgment, but he did not sufficiently distinguish between his copyings and his interpolations. We have seen what was the ability of Bradford and Winslow; Morton's was much smaller; he may be described, in Dr. Johnson's phrase, as "a harmless drudge," whose own words have little strength or character. But, at least, he made a book; he saved important materials from destruction, and furnished New England with a local history, tolerably trustworthy, save in such examples of bigotry as that shown in his mention of Roger Williams. The loss of Bradford's manuscript—used by Hutchinson and Prince—made Morton's book still more valuable for many years. He also deserves some credit for collecting, in his "Memorial," specimens of New England's little stock of original verse—which was "poor but pious." The modern reader is glad that Morton felt that "the weight of duty" lay upon him "to commemorate to future generations the memorable passages of God's providence to us and our predecessors in the beginning of this plantation"; and he still responds willingly to Morton's gentle deprecation: "And now courteous reader, that I may not hold thee too long in the porch, I only crave of thee to read this following discourse with a single eye, and with the same ends as I had in penning it. Let not the smallness of our beginnings, nor weakness of instruments, make the thing seem little, or the work despicable ; but, on the contrary, let the greater praise be rendered unto God, who hath effected great things by small means.*

The diaries or annals of Bradford, Winslow, and Winthrop are indispensable sources of authority in early New England history ; and, of course, they throw some light upon the social life of the colonists. But that life, in a later part of the eighteenth century, had become fuller and more complex ; it is fortunate, therefore, that a longer, more detailed, and more entertaining record of it is presented in the elaborate diary of Samuel Sewall, who has not inaptly been called (by Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge) " the ^{Samuel} Puritan Pepys." ^{Sewall,} Boston and London, just 1662-1730. before 1700, were very different places : the former had nothing corresponding to the Restoration, the plague, the fire, the social richness of the great English metropolis ; but it may truly be said that Chief-Justice Sewall did for Boston what Mr. Secretary Pepys did for London,—to compare small things with great. The general method of the two diarizers was the same.

In Samuel Sewall we have an American product. He was born in England, to be sure, but his grandfather and father were Massachusetts colonists, the latter one of the founders of Newbury, Massachusetts, whither the boy Samuel was brought in 1661, at the age of nine. Ten years later he graduated at Harvard, of which he was resident fellow and librarian ; and as the chief function of the college was the education of ministers, Sewall meant to begin life as a preacher. Marrying an heiress, he gave up his profession, though never his piety ; turned his attention to the law ; sat in the royal council of the province : and for the last part of his life was a judge of the superior court for twenty-nine years, and chief-justice for ten years of this time. He was an opponent of slavery, a friend of Indian Christian education, a social, political, and judicial leader. He applied Puritan principles to the development of the founded state ; and his solidity of character, his range of learning and sympathies, and his discretion (unsettled only in the witchcraft delusion), made him a centre of influence for half a century.

Sewall's little three-page tract, "The Selling of Joseph," printed in Boston in 1700, was one of the first arguments against African slavery on American soil ; possibly it was the very first. At that time, it will be remembered, a few slaves were owned in New England, and Judge Sewall was writing of an evil near at hand. He treated it justly and vigorously, and some of his sentences were precursors of the ringing words of the later and more directly successful abolitionists. In what he said of liberty in general he apparently did not perceive any inconsistency with his arbitrary and bigoted treatment of Friends, Church of England men, and other theological opponents ; but his conclusions were true, and farther reaching than he knew. Like most of the New England leaders,

Sewall also wrote two books on America,—in the second of which he considered it scripturally, as the future earthly paradise ; but this last portentously titled collection of “Phenomena Quædam Apocalyp-tica,” with its unfoldings of prophecy, need not now detain us.* No more valuable is his “Talitha Cumi ; or An Invitation to Women to look after their Inheritance in the Heavenly Mansions,” in which he learnedly argued that women would be found in heaven,—a theme fit for affirmative discussion in Sir Thomas Browne’s “Vulgar Errors.” Sewall was an inveterate penman ; but all his other writings are side-shows in comparison with his bulky life-record, the “Diary from 1673 to 1729.”

Judge Sewall, unlike most writers of diaries, did not weary of his task, nor did he make full entries at one period and meagre records at another. From its commencement to its close the diary goes unflaggingly and evenly on, and its general method is unchanged. Every thing noteworthy is jotted down, and we have a full picture of the man and of his times for half a century. We learn the characteristics of himself and his family ; we see his relatives, friends, and associates ; we know whither he went and what he did, in public and private life ; we study the manners of the time ; we share in its religious and political aspirations, movements, and controversies ; we take part with Sewall in the management of the affairs of Harvard College (already, in his opinion, becoming a little heterodox); and we go with him to England for a year's space. And not only this: we look into the man's heart; note his religious "elevations" and depressions; and even share in his four courtships and two marriages at an age nearer seventy than sixty. To follow this record as a mere matter of personal gossip and old-time chatter, would be unprofitable to us and sometimes unkind to the dead old worthy; but to study it for the light it throws upon American thought and civilization two centuries ago, is at once a solid benefit and a genuine entertainment.* In these many pages of Sewall we find traces of austerity, narrowness, bigotry, pettiness, and (in the witchcraft matter) fatal delusion; but we are still more impressed with the writer's sincerity, constant endeavor to do right, and faithful adherence to those principles of duty which are the foundation of society. The little details of his life are no more trivial than would be those of most men, if written down as fully; the records of an old man's courtships, melancholy-amusing as they are,—and it should be said that they ought not to have been printed,—reveal nothing morally discreditable; and even in the witchcraft error, let us not forget that Sewall shared

* "Judge Sewall is better known to us in both his outer and inner being, in all his elements, composition, and manifestation of character, in his whole personal, domestic, social, official, and religious life, than is any other individual in our local history of two hundred and fifty years. And this is true not only of himself, but through his pen, curiously active, faithful, candid, kind, impartial, and even just, his own times stand revealed and described to us, as if by thousands of daguerreotypes and repeating telephones" —George E. Ellis, D.D., address on Samuel Sewall, in the Old South Church, Boston, Sunday, Oct. 26, 1884.

his mistake with hundreds of the most learned and devout men of his time, in both hemispheres; that his part in the executions was no greater than that of others of high standing in England and America; and that, more fully than any of them, he publicly and privately recanted.

The first entry is dated Dec. 3, 1673, when Sewall was a resident at Harvard College, where he had taken his bachelor's degree two years before: "I read to the Senior Sophisters, the 14th Chapter of Heerboord's Physick, i. e., part of it, which begins thus, Sensus Communes, etc. I went to the end, and then red it over from the beginning, which I ended the 24th of March, 167 $\frac{3}{4}$." At this beginning of his diarizing, Sewall was just twenty-one years old. He continued to write until "Feria Secunda, Octob: 13, 1729," when he was an old man of seventy-seven (to die within three months); recording that "Judge Davenport comes to me between ten and eleven a-clock in the morning and speaks to me on behalf of Mr. Addington Davenport, his eldest Son, that he might have Liberty to wait upon Jane Hirst [Sewall's granddaughter], now at my House, in way of Courtship. He told me he would deal by him as his eldest Son, and more than so. Inten'd to build a House where his uncle Addington dwelt for him; and that he should have his Pue in the Old Meetinghouse. I gave him my Hand at his going away, and acknowledged his Respect to me and granted his desire. He said Madam Addington would wait upon me. His honour the Lieut. Governor visited me quickly after, and acquainted me that he design'd for Newbury in a day or two, to stay a week or fortnight. I informed his Honor of what Mr. Davenport had been about ; his Honor approved it much, Comended the young Man, and reckon'd it a very good Match."

Fifty-six years separate the young Harvard instructor from the courtly old man, making "a very good match" for his granddaughter. In the chronicle of these years all things are noted ; it is hard to sample so great a store. One day (March 18, 1701) he will tell us that "Last night I heard several Claps of Thunder : Great Fogg to day" ; and the next day be a historical entry : "We hear by the way of Virginia that War is proclaimed between England and France." Then Lord Bellomont dies and is honored, and a lesser event occurs : "the Artillery Company give three Volleys in the middle of the Town when they came out of the field, with regard to my Lord. Col. Townsend wears a Wigg to day." Sewall himself never would wear a wig ; the Lord had given and taken away his hair, and he would not borrow any, though the lack partly caused him the loss of goodly Katherine Winthrop when he went a-courting in his old age. Politics and wigs, piety and dinners come side by side : "Text, wisdom is the principal thing. Grace is Glory in the Bud ; Glory is Grace full-blown. Din'd with Mr. Belchar." "Mr. Cotton Mather prays for the College and other schools. Mr. Ezk. Lewis marries the widow Kilcup." Post hoc and propter hoc combine : "Sept: 12th Mrs. Tuthill falls through a Trap Door into the cellar, breaks her right Thigh just above the knee, so that the bones pierce through the skin.—Sept^r 19. Mrs. Tuthill dies.” Funeral records abound from first to last : the Judge never let slip any opportunity of “ assisting ” at these melancholy scenes. Marriages and dinner parties were less numerous, but duly appreciated. At sick-beds the good man was often present, praying that physic might precede “ restauration ” ; and he was an inveterate bestower of small charities, the price of which, whether pious books or sweet-meats, was almost always duly noted. Of the orthodoxy, new buildings, and belongings at Harvard he took due care, and specially liked Commencement-day. Once when his son was taken sick on the latter occasion he ill concealed his vexation. He sat in courts, civil and ecclesiastical ; he summarized sermons, and occasionally admonished the clergy on doctrinal points. He liked the good old times, and deplored the degeneracy of the later Puritans, but he had his own modest pleasures and chastened enjoyments of this world’s good things,—funerals included. But in almost all things he was dignified, sensible, and genuinely pious. He began his works with a prayer ; he ended them with a Laus Deo.*

In 1736, in Boston, appeared a tidy little volume which was in every way creditable to the Thomas Prince, incipient literature of the colony. It was 1687-1758. neatly “ printed by Kneeland & Green for S. Gerish,” in 18mo, with sober black borders around the page, various typographical devices for convenient reference, and a rubricated title-page, setting forth the ambitious scope of the work. It was not a manuscript record, like Bradford's or Winslow's, nor a glorification of a new Canaan, nor a mere collection of other men's words; but it was planned to be "A Chronological History of New-England in the Form of Annals: being a summary and exact Account of the most material Transactions and Occurrences relating to This Country, in the Order of Time wherein they happened, from the Discovery by Capt. Gosnold in 1602, to the Arrival of Governor Belcher, in 1730." This comparatively modest scheme was precluded by "an Introduction, containing a brief Epitome of the most remarkable Transactions and Events Abroad, from the Creation: Including the connected Line of Time, the Succession of Patriarchs and Sovereigns of the most famous Kingdoms & Empires, the gradual Discoveries of America, and the Progress of the Reformation to the Discovery of New England." The learned and ambitious author was Thomas Prince, M.A., minister of the Old South Church in Boston. The time had come, he thought, for a compendious history of New England, with a general historical introduction. His mottoes, from Deuteronomy and Job, were: "Remember the Days of Old, consider the Years of Many Generations"; "For enquire, I pray thee, of the former Age, and prepare thy self for the Search of their Fathers." The good clergyman was trying to do for New England what the monastic authors of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle accomplished for Old England six or seven hundred years before.

Prince was a Massachusetts man by birth and education ; Sandwich was his native town ; he duly graduated at Harvard ; entered the former profession of Harvard—the ministry ; and when thirty-one years old became minister of the Old South (Third Congregational) Church in Boston. Those were the days of long pastorates, and Prince held his position for forty years. Foreign travel and a studious habit aided his influence, which was as wide as that of the chief ministers of his day in the New England metropolis. His historical reading was specially thorough, and though his learning was less than that of the English prodigies of the previous century, it was undoubtedly more solid than that of the pretentious Cotton Mather. Prince dabbled in science without unsettling his faith, and he read and wrote history in a patient and philosophic spirit. He did American historical work of the second stage ; he took diaries, letters, and documents and drew from them an orderly, continuous, and trustworthy narrative. His library was the best in his time, and the use he made of it keeps his name in honorable memory. His book suffers from its form—that of annals,—but an uninterrupted historical narrative was perhaps too much to expect in those days. The annal style was fashionable ; and, at least, it had the advantage of conciseness and accuracy, the qualities specially needed. Prince was determined to test every statement submitted to his judgment ; and to print only what was likely to be of permanent value. Clearly American literature, poor as it was, had got beyond the John-Smith stage.

This faithful historian also possessed another needed trait, that of perceiving that real history cannot be written save by the comparative method. To understand aright the record of English doings in the New World, some consideration of the history of Old England, and of the world in general, was needed. Therefore, we have his weighty introduction of eighty-four pages, from Adam to King James I. In this introduction a very compact arrangement by tables is presented, and the necessary explanations are given in foot-notes. The connection between Christian and secular history, and between Continental and English, is carefully shown; and important social acts, such as the invention of printing, the completion of the Wycliffe Bible, etc., are duly noted. It is certain that New England possessed no other historical compend so full, so convenient, or so trustworthy as this general introduction by Prince.

Like that later historian, Henry Thomas Buckle, the laborious Prince began on a scale which he could not follow to the end. Only the first volume of the work was ever published, though three thirty-two-page pamphlets subsequently appeared. September 7, 1630, is the last regular entry of a date, in the bound issue, though October 14, 1632, is mentioned. The continuation brought the record to August 5, 1633, and it there stops, a fragment, but a useful and meritorious fragment. The author was a slow worker and a busy man; there was waiting for such work as his a real but not an enthusiastic nor a lasting welcome; and he apparently allowed his zeal to flag toward the close of his life. In what he did he displayed the internal qualities needed in an historian : painstaking care for accuracy, and a philosophic temper ; and though his book is somewhat forbidding in form and lacking in beauty of style, it marked an improvement upon the slipshod work of Morton. Prince was the direct forerunner of the eminent list of Boston historians ; his name is fitly commemorated by one of the historical societies of that city ; and it is an interesting fact that the closing pages of his history are devoted to an account of the naming of the Puritan capital :

Order'd . . . that Trimountain be called BOSTON.
. . . Thus this remarkable PENINSULA, about two Miles in Length and one in Breadth, in those times appearing at High Water in the form of two Islands who's Indian Name was Shawmut ; but I suppose on the account of three contiguous Hills appearing in a range to those at Charlestown, by the English called at first Trimountain, and now receives the Name of BOSTON. Which Deputy Governor Dudley says, they had before intended to call the Place they first resolv'd on : and Mr. Hubbard, that they gave this Name on the account of Mr. COTTON, [the then famous Puritan Minister of Boston in England ;] for whom they had the highest Reverence, and of whose coming over they were doubtless in some hopeful Prospect. And from the late Judge Sewall in comparison with the Charlestown Records, I learn, that this Town was settled under the Conduct of Mr. JOHNSON ; whom Mr. Hubbard calls, a worthy Gentleman of Note for Piety and Wisdom ; and the Rev. Mr. Danforth, of Roxbury, styles him—a right Nathaniel, eminent for Piety and Virtue ; and in another Place, a Gentleman of singular Piety and Sincerity.

To this Town, the major Part of the Church in a little time Removes from Charlestown ; and so much increases, as that One Hundred fifty & one are admitted by Oct. 14 1632, when they peaceably Divide into two Churches.

“Thus out of small Beginnings * Great Things have been produced by HIS HAND that made all things, and gives Being to all things that are: and as one small Candle may light a Thousand; so the Light Here kindled hath shone to many, yea in some sort to our whole Nation: Let the Glorious Name of JEHOVAH have all the Praise.”

A service analogous to Prince's for Massachusetts, was performed for Virginia by William Stith, third William Stith, 1689-1755. president of Virginia's college of William and Mary, which was the centre of the intellectual life of the colony. Stith, like Prince, was a native of the region whose history was undertaken; and, like him, he availed himself of the materials left by preceding writers. The parallel is continued when we say that Stith was a minister, that he lived at the colonial capital, and that both his studies and his personal acquaintance with celebrities were wide. Prince's book appeared in Boston in 1736; Stith's in Virginia in 1747; and both were but parts of projected works, Prince's coming down to 1630, Stith's to 1624. Neither book was a model of literary style, but Prince's could boast the more orderly arrangement. Stith, however, usually brought his sentences to a close, which Prince sometimes forgot to do.

Stith had not reached the modern critical position as an historian; indeed, he did not sift alleged facts with sufficient industry. John Smith was at that time in full credit as a veracious chronicler, and

* This quotation is from Bradford.

Stith's "History of the First Discovery and Settlement of Virginia" duly and respectfully follows his statements. But the manuscript and printed authorities in Williamsburg were by no means confined to Smith's works; and the learned author of this new book relied largely upon other sources. The History is decidedly the most important work of its class produced in the Southern colonies before the Revolution. Virginia had a record worth writing, and the time had come to reduce it to a permanent form. The original sight-seers had passed away; now followed the sober chroniclers of days already become historic. Virginia from 1607 to 1624 was in its first—but by no means its last—period of romantic story; and Stith did his best to describe faithfully the doings of men already half passed into a legendary stage. His success was not commanding, but it was respectable.*

* His book (published in 1747) appeared five years before the author became president of William and Mary. A verbatim reprint appeared in New York in 1866.

"The reverend William Stith, a native of Virginia, and president of its college, has also written the history of the same [early] period, in a large octavo volume of small print. He was a man of classical learning, and very exact, but of no taste in style. He is inelegant, therefore, and his details often too minute to be tolerable, even to a native of the country whose history he writes."—Thomas Jefferson, "Notes on the State of Virginia," ed. 1801, 346-7.

CHAPTER IV.

THE THEOLOGIANS OF THE SEVENTEENTH AND EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES.

WEIGHTY works with long titles—these we find by the dozen in the collections of American books and pamphlets of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. By them the bibliographer can minutely trace the progress of printing in the New World, and the theologian can define the character and follow the course of religious opinion and practice in a land where religion was the all-important thing. But have they any literary value? What has literature to do with such treatises as these? :

“The Covenant of Grace Opened: Wherein These Particulars are Handled; viz.: (1) What the Covenant of Grace is; (2) What the Seales of the Covenant are; (3) Who are the Parties and Subjects fit to receive these Seales. From all which Particulars Infants Babtisme is proved and vindicated.”

“The Application of Redemption by the Effectual Work of the Word and Spirit of Christ, for the Bringing Home of Lost Sinners to God.”

“A Survey of the summe of Church-Discipline: Wherein, The Way of the Churches of New-England is warranted out of the Word, and all Exceptions of weight, which are made against it, answered.”

The author of these books, and others like them, was Thomas Hooker, founder of Hartford, a church and town leader, a denominational authority, and a great and untiring preacher, in the opinion of his hearers. Two hours and a quarter he preached, on one occasion, and the thunders of his spoken words were caught and held in many booklets and pamphlets once read in New England and even in London, but undisturbed now, save by the antiquary or the auctioneer. A good, magisterial, narrow, useful man—how often must this record be made of one or another of the early Puritans! But his printed sermons, with all their intense theology, are not able to reproduce for us the achievements of the speaker: in nothing save doctrinal force do they surpass the utterances of a thousand pulpits to-day; their kinship in literature lies only in the fact that they were written, and that they had an ideal theme. This must be the final verdict with reference to thousands of printed pages produced by godly and justly honored American ministers before the Revolution. Their quaint characteristics and their doctrinal systems do not make them literature, for the most part. But in them the American mind was steadily working. The force of that mind was first felt in theology, second, in politics, last, in literature proper.

It is not easy, in these days of the independence of the laity, to estimate rightly the power of the ministers in early New England. Few Roman Catholic priests exercise a more potent control over their congregations than did these ministers and servants of the First Churches of Boston, Salem, Plymouth, over their independent and democratic flocks. Theoretically, the minister was but one among the congregation, or rather the body of church-members; practically, however, he was a force in public affairs and in social order. He advised and warned on spiritual themes, and he spoke as one having authority in political questions. "That deservedly famous man of God, Mr. John Cotton," as John Cotton, John Norton called him, was the minister of 1585-1652. the First Church of Boston, and therefore held an official position which made him a sort of metropolitan, or presiding bishop, of the strictly Puritan diocese. That which form could not do, among these scorers of form, was brought about by sheer intellectual ability and the force of circumstances. Weaklings and dunces have occupied high positions in hierarchical organizations; strong men have become leaders in democracies, religious as well as political. Cotton had been a famous preacher in Cambridge, England; he lost none of his resonance and robustness of manner and scholarship when he turned Puritan and came to New England. He had been an Anglican priest in Boston, England; Laud hounded him out of the country; he fled to the new Boston, which was named in his honor; and there he found full scope for his powers.

But of Cotton as a writer there is not much to say. Of his catechism called "Spiritual Milk for American Babes" (forming a part of that godly classic, the "New England Primer"), we have already spoken; these nine little pages are now his only remembered writings. But thirty or forty works of his, large and small, have come down to us. He waged a bitter theological war with Roger Williams, as vehement (and fortunately quite as polite) as those which Milton was at that time fighting with his foes on the other side of the water. He could turn from "The Pouring out of the Seven Vials" to "A Brief Exposition of the Whole Book of Canticles"; great as he was deemed he was willing to pen "A Modest and Cleare Answer to Mr. Ball's Discourse of set Formes of Prayer"; he felt able to describe "The Doctrine of the Church to which are committed the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven"; but he strove to walk humbly in "The Way of Life; or, God's Way and Course, in bringing the Soule into, keeping it in, and carrying it on in, the wayes of life and peace." Others called him the patriarch of New England; but he himself was only trying to show that "The Way of the Churches of Christ in New England" was "The Way of Churches walking in Brotherly equalitie, without Subjection of one Church to another." Good, earnest, strong man that he was, perhaps he does not now regret that the greater learning of the Boston which owes him so much, makes upon literature a far deeper mark than his own.

Roger Williams, Cotton's great opponent, had originally been a Church-of-England minister, but had, like Cotton, become a Non-Roger Williams, 1606-1683. conformist. After his arrival in New England, he was for a time minister of the Salem First Church, but later became identified with the Baptists, and with the fortunes of Providence. His relations with the Puritans were in every way unpleasant. Williams was a believer in civil and ecclesiastical freedom, and he greatly annoyed his pædo-baptist opponents by insisting that their principles of "freedom to worship God" be carried one step farther, or at least that they become tolerant of the opinions of others. Modern New England—indeed, modern civilization—has accepted many of the principles for which Williams so bravely and logically fought. In his Providence colony he sundered church and State, and civil court and religious opinion and practice—all so closely united in Massachusetts; and there he admitted the Friends, though he repudiated and tried to overthrow some of their arguments and beliefs. The whole relation of Williams to the Puritans shows how inconvenient it is for reformers to have within their number one willing to go a step farther, and to bring their own inconsistencies to light. Williams was an able, earnest, and successful pioneer in that great movement toward religious freedom which has characterized the history of the United States. But in justice to the Puritans it should be said that he was sometimes hasty, indiscreet, sensational; and that he lacked the self-control which should be shown by a great reformer, as well as the solid learning of the Puritan leaders.

Williams wrote voluminously, bravely, vigorously, often violently, in favor of freedom of conscience, the severance of Church and State in England and America, and, above all, the abolition of persecution because of religious opinion. For "not loose, but Christian libertie," no American ever wrote more boldly or truthfully. To this theme were devoted his two chief works : "The Bloody Tenent of Persecution for cause of Conscience (a dialogue between Truth and Peace)," and "The Bloody Tenent yet more Bloody, by Mr. Cotton's attempt to wash it white in the Blood of the Lamb." This was a reply to Cotton's "Bloody Tenent washed and made white in the Blood of the Lamb." In this controversy Williams had the upper hand. Less worthy are his "Hireling Ministry none of Christ's," and his hateful and personal attack on the system of the Friends : "George Fox digg'd out of his Burrowes." To this Fox replied under the slightly gentler title of "A New England Fire-Brand Quenched." It is pleasant to get beyond these billingsgate theological controversies, of Old and New England, in the middle of the seventeenth century ; and it is fortunate that they are now read only by the historian and the antiquary. In those days it had been better for many not to put theological pen to sermon-paper, but to say patiently with Job : "Oh . . . that I had the indictment which my adversary hath written."

Translations of foreign works, made in a vernacular tongue, do not hold an important place in the literature of that tongue. When George Sandys completed his translation of Ovid, during his temporary stay on the banks of the James River, he was only indirectly benefiting future Amer-<sup>John Eliot, 1604-1690.</sup>ican literature. At about this time, however, was completed, in England, the great King James version of the Bible, which was destined to affect all English and American literature so profoundly. There is but one King James Bible, and but one Luther's Bible ; what literary place or influence can be assigned to that version of the Bible, in the Indian (Algonkin) language, which good John Eliot, of Roxbury, the "apostle to the Indians," made in the middle of the seventeenth century? This, at least, that it was the first translation of the Bible made by an American resident, the first Bible printed in British America, and the pioneer in that long line of philological and literary labors done by godly and learned American missionaries in all parts of the world. And this, too, that it was the mighty and patiently wrought sign of Christian love toward those whom the white men were slowly crowding toward the West, and whose dusky skins, some said, were the earthly covering of no immortal souls. Eliot thought that the Indians were the descendants of the lost ten tribes of Israel ; to their conversion he chiefly devoted his learning and his life ; and for them he pleaded even in the midst of Indian wars. No opposition on the part of his friends could deter him from his work ; and his little churches of Indians did their Christian labors as best they could, Indian converts from Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay aiding their teacher. Eliot also wrote an English harmony of the Gospels, an Algonkin grammar, several brief accounts of work among the Indians, and a tract in favor of church councils, in which he was an earnest advocate of such a semi-Presbyterian system as might bring the Presbyterians and Congregationalists together. Another (and an unpopular) pamphlet was "The Christian Commonwealth, or, The Civil Policy of the Rising Kingdom of Jesus Christ," (London, 1660). But we chiefly remember him, with Roger Williams and Daniel Gookin, as the Indian's friend and Christian teacher; and in his honor transcribe the title of his one great work:

"Mamusse Wunneetupanatamwe Up-Biblum God naneeswe Nukkone Testament kah wonk Wusku Testament. Ne quoshkinnumuk nashpe Wuttinneumoh Christ noh asooweesit John Eliot." [Cambridge, N. E., 1661-1663.]*

The great clerico-literary family of early New England was that of the Mathers. Its position in Massachusetts theology was as commanding as that of the Adams family in Massachusetts politics a century later. The first in the direct and noted line was Richard (1596-1669), a native of England, an Oxford man, a Church-of-England minister, a Non-conformist, a Massachusetts Puritan clergyman, and a ready writer; this order of events, as we have seen, was repeated in the lives of many ministers of the period. Richard's son was Increase (1639-1723); the son of Increase was Cotton (1663-1728); and the son of Cotton was Samuel (1706-1785), a Harvard graduate, a Boston minister, a pamphleteer, sermon-printer, and pseudo-poet, and the author of a life of his father. Of this line of devout orthodox divines, the second and third were the greater, and the third the greatest of all.

*The New Testament appeared first in 1661, and the whole Bible in 1663. Eliot did all the work himself.

It would be irreverent to call Increase Mather a Jack-of-all-trades ; it is historical to say that he was ambitious to shine in many lights. He Increase Mather, 1639-1723. graduated at Harvard in 1656, and was an early example of the fashion of taking an additional degree abroad, for he duly proceeded as Master of Arts from Trinity College, Dublin, in 1658. Twenty-nine years after leaving Harvard he became its president, holding office sixteen years. Meanwhile, he was a preacher in Boston, and performed for the colony a dubious, partly beneficial, diplomatic service in 1692, when he procured for Massachusetts a new and semi-democratic charter, which actually made Mather himself the namer of the governor, deputy-governor, and council. Mather afterward appointed these officers, with his son as his chief adviser in the business. Father and son were aristocrats, or strict Federalists in early colonial politics, and high-church Congregationalists in religious practice, trying to increase clerical power at the expense of lay. Increase Mather gave the churches stability, and his charter, though no improvement upon the old, and restricting popular choice, was perhaps the best to be obtained at the time.

Mather was a learned man, and a solid and (we are told) effective sermonizer, whose printed discourses have a wide range, abound in quotations, after the fashion of the time, served their purpose, and really were not worth typographical perpetuation. Most printed sermons are like letter-files or bound volumes of daily newspapers, never referred to, save for a date, and for controversial purposes, and those of this great Boston figure are not exceptions. Increase Mather apparently had a deeper knowledge than that of Cotton, with less facility, less fondness for display, and less bungling inaccuracy.

His chief work was a compilation, a sort of devout American story-book of the supernatural, "printed by Samuel Green, for Joseph Browning," in "Boston in New England," 1684, entitled: "An Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences. Wherein an Account is given of many Remarkable and very Memorable Events, which have happened this last Age, especially in New England. By Increase Mather, Teacher of a Church at Boston in New England." *

Twelve chapters compose the work, in which the author considers remarkable sea deliverances, remarkable preservations ("a child that had part of her brains struck out, and yet lived and did well," etc.); "remarkables about thunder and lightning," miscellaneous "things preternatural which have happened in New England," "dæmons and possessed persons," ghosts and apparitions, deaf and dumb people, petrifications, vegetable parasites of animals, New England storms, and many other matters. The book is a strange medley of piety and superstition, elementary science and crass ignorance. Mather profoundly believed in special providences, which he reverently followed, but his Deity sometimes seems to be shrewdly lying in wait for his victims, instead of saying in that most mighty of sentences: "Vengeance is mine; I will repay." The devil, also, is a worker in nature. "It is not heresie," says Mather, "to believe that Satan has sometimes a great operation in causing thunderstorms. . . . 'Satan, let loose by God, can do wonders in the air; he can raise storms, he can discharge the great ordnance of Heaven, thunder and lightning, and, by his art, can make them more terrible and dreadful than they are in their own nature.'" Again: "If the fallen angels are able (when God shall grant them a commission) to cause fearful and fatal thunders, it is much more true concerning the good and holy angels"; which statement, like many others in the book, is supported by copious Bible references. In witchcraft Mather believed (the book was published nine years before the Salem delusion), and he argues in favor of the truth of the thing, with much show of ancient learning, modern investigation, and scriptural authority. "The argument by many insisted on from the Scriptures is irrefragable; therein witchcrafts are forbidden. . . . Experience has too often made it manifest that there are such in the world as hold a correspondence with hell. . . . There have been many in the world who have, upon conviction, confessed themselves guilty of familiarity with the devil." On the other hand, "good angels do sometimes visibly appear," while mere apparitions are not so frequent in places where the Gospel prevaieth as in the dark corners of the earth." But, alas! Satan sometimes appears in the guise of good men, and "caco-dæmons" pretend to be good angels. "As for the spirits of men deceased, "it is certain they cannot re-assume their bodies, nor yet come to men in this world when they will, or without a permission from Him in whose hand they are . . . That the ghosts of dead persons have sometimes appeared, that so the sin of murder (as well as that of theft) might be discovered, is a thing notoriously known." "The procuring cause" of "the appearance of persons deceased" "is usually some sin committed."

This quaint book appeared two years before the first folio of Sir Thomas Browne, and two years after the death of that knightly physician; but as Browne's books had appeared separately, Mather was much influenced by him. By a coincidence, the last chapter is devoted to "an account of some remarkables at Norwich, in New-England"; the great Dr. Browne, it will be remembered, long dwelt at the English Norwich. Mather's style is inferior to that of the author of the "Religio Medici," but better than that of most early New England writers. He was a good editor, and his great accumulation of anecdotes, from many sources, is conveniently and attractively arranged. Browne's charity is almost lacking in Mather, who deems the Quakers "under the strong delusions of Satan," "some of them undoubtedly possessed with evil and infernal spirits, and acted in a more than ordinary manner by the inmates of hell"; but he is willing to say that they are "indeed to be pitied, in that they themselves know not that an evil spirit doth possess and act them."

I believe that the preparation, the comparative excellence, and the popularity of this weird book are to be explained by the half-suppressed poetical sense of Puritanism, which would find utterance in these lurid or ghostly pages. Mather, nearly two centuries before Poe, alludes to the "Mr. Glanvil" of Poe's Ligeia; and some of Mather's stories are decidedly in Poe's own style. The Puritans had no Fall of the House of Usher to read, so they listened to the Reverend Doctor Mather as he told them "That houses are sometimes troubled by evil spirits." They knew not and cared not for the popish Divine Comedy, but the poetry in them would "climb to a soul" in Wigglesworth's Day of Doom.

It has been said that Aristotle knew all that was to be known in his day. Of Cotton Mather it might be Cotton Mather, 1663-1728. declared that he sampled all knowledge accessible in New England. His learning was multifarious, his personal acquaintance wide, his zeal unflagging, his intentions of the best. An essayist has written of "the prodigiousness of Doctor Johnson"; the enormousness of Cotton Mather might not be an inapt title. On both sides he was descended from the clerical aristocracy of New England (his mother was a daughter of John Cotton), and he raised himself to a position more prominent than that of any of his predecessors in the genealogical line. Admiration and wonder he aroused without difficulty; affection and confidence hardly went out toward him. His position, unduly magnified in his own day, is belittled now by a usual fate. But that he had some qualities of greatness is undeniable.

He was the very man to gather and arrange that literary mass whose appropriate title was "Magnalia Christi Americana"—the chief among nearly four hundred productions, great and small, of his inveterate pen.

Cotton Mather showed precocious ability, as he had a right to do, in view of his inherited blood. But though he rivalled John Stuart Mill in early acquaintance with many books and subjects, his educational discipline was less methodical than Mill's, and even more likely to make the son a juvenile attitudinarian and sayer of smart things. He graduated at Harvard at fifteen—it must be remembered that the requirements for graduation were about equivalent to those for admission now; but nevertheless the boy was acquainted with a fair share of "classical learning," and could talk Latin, in the fashion of the time. Of course he became a minister—he was born a preacher; and when little more than of age he was associate pastor of the North Church, Boston, the head of which was his father, Increase Mather. Those were the days of long pastorates; the minister and the people had the good old-fashioned idea that their union was a lasting one; and father and son died in office, the former in 1723, the latter only five years later. In all the days of the Matherian apostolic succession at the North Church (now extinct) it was a great ecclesiastical, political, and social centre. We have already seen that this influence was always conservative, sometimes reactionary; that the witchcraft persecutions were abetted by both the Mathers; and that the personal, magisterial, domineering element was altogether too prominent. They lived like a bishop and his coadjutor ; indeed, there was in Cotton Mather a semi-monastic, ascetic, ritualistic element ; Puritan though he was, he made much of times and circumstances ; he fasted, analyzed, and re-analyzed his spiritual state in minutest detail, and made trivial acts semi-sacramental reminders of divine prototypes. Of course he was a formalist in the arrangement of his time, and a most industrious worker. He read and wrote in six or seven languages, and was especially familiar with Hebrew and Latin ; he had note-books in plenty, and better still, a full and ready memory. In talk he was a sort of lesser Johnson or Coleridge ; in literature a Puritan Burton, without his wit. All his writings are full of quotations, learned allusions, elaborate personifications, Latin, Greek, or Hebrew titles. Was Mather an intentional and pretentious pedant ? By no means ; he was a widely-read man, following the fashion of English learning in the seventeenth century, and sincerely desirous to instruct and benefit the growing society in which he lived. To us he seems bombastic, inaccurate, unlovely ; but he did not so seem to his subjects,—nor to himself ; and his work was in many ways helpful and stimulating. If he agreed with his father in favoring the death-penalty for alleged witchcraft, let it not be forgotten that he worked faithfully for the oppressed and suffering, for prisoners, sailors, Indians. And in his “Magnalia” he really made, for a time, the New England book of religious, political, educational, and biographical information.

The book marks the beginning of eighteenth century literature in America ; it appeared in 1702, and was published in London, like many New England treatises of the time. Its very title showed its weight and its far-reaching ambition, and also illustrated the close union between Church and secular history in the colonial period : “ Magnalia Christi Americana : or the Ecclesiastical History of New England, from Its First Planting in the year 1620, unto the year of our Lord, 1698, In Seven Books.” It had eight hundred folio pages, and its seven books discussed the foundings of the colonies, the lives of famous ministers and civilians, the history of Harvard College, the church councils, etc.; gave a “ faithful record of many illustrious, wonderful providences ” ; and finally chronicled “ the Wars of the Lord, being an history of the manifold afflictions and disturbances of the churches in New England, from their various adversaries, and the wonderful methods and mercies of God in their deliverance ; in six chapters ; to which is subjoined an appendix of remarkable occurrences which New England had in the wars with the Indian salvages, from the year 1688 to 1698.” Mather completed his work as planned ; and on the whole rounded it well, externally but not internally. The “ Magnalia ” is religious as well as secular, and is to be classed with the theological division of colonial literature, and not with the historical. It is a miscellaneous and vast storehouse of information ; but prejudice colors fact, doctrine overtops record, and we lack in Mather that tidiness and accuracy which so shine in the pages of Bradford, Winthrop, and Sewall. A learned historical authority (James Savage) has exposed many of Mather's mistakes ; and, unfortunately, has shown that some of them are worse than careless. Perhaps, however, we should be thankful that Mather gave us so much, and should not criticise him too minutely. He is later than Bradford and Winthrop ; fuller as well as later than Prince (though Prince lived after him) ; and he prepares the way for Hutchinson. He greatly helps us in attaining our present full knowledge of Puritan New England before 1700.

Let it be plainly understood, however, that whatever the credit due to Mather as minister, preacher, compiler, scholar, and force, little belongs to him as man of letters. His "Late Memorable Providences relating to Witchcrafts and Possessions" (1689), and "Wonders of the Invisible World" (1693) are slovenly and illogical. A plain "merchant of Boston in New England," Robert Calef, in his "More Wonders of the Invisible World" (London, 1700) easily overthrew his illustrious opponent.* The "Magnalia," despite its inclusiveness and augustness, its awe-inspiring quotations and allusions, is an untidy piece of literature,—inexcusably so when we consider its author's ability, training, and opportunities. It need not detain us much longer ; let us only stop to read one of its most elaborate passages, on which the author evidently expended his best powers,—the introduction to the "History of Harvard Colledge" :

* See the reprint of the two works (by Calef and Mather) in "Salem Witchcraft," edited by Samuel P. Fowler ; Boston : 1865.

“If there have been Universities in the world, which a Beza would call Flabella Satanæ, and a Luther would call Cathedras Pestilentiæ, and antichristi luminaria, and a third ventures to style Synagogas perditionis and puteos abyssi; the excellent Arrowsmith has truly observed, that it is no more to be inferred from hence that all are so, than that all books are to be burnt, because the Christians did burn the magical ones at Ephesus. The New-Englanders have not been Weigelians: or the disciples of the furious fanatick, who held forth [Reader, let it never be translated into English!] Nullam esse in universo Terrarum Orbe Academiam, in qua Christus inveniatur; in Academijs ne tantillam quidem Christi cognitionem reperiri posse: Noluisse Christum Evangelium prædicari per Diabolos; ergo non per Academicos. Lest all the Hellebore of New England (a countrey abounding with Hellebore) should not suffice to restore such dreamers unto their wits, it hath produced an University also, for their better information, their utter confutation. Behold, an American University, presenting herself, with her sons before her Europæan mothers for their blessing. An University which hath been to these plantations, as Livy saith of Greece, for the good literature there cultivated, SAL GENTIUM; an University, which may make her boast unto the circumjacent regions, like that of the orator on the behalf of the English Cambridge, Fecimus (absit verbo invidia, cui abest Falsitas) ne in Demagorij's lapis sederet super lapidem, ne deesent id templis theologi, in Foris Jurisperiti, in oppidis medici; rempublicam, ecclesiam, sedatum, exercitum, viris doctis replevimus, eoq; melius bono publico inservire comparatis, quo magis eruditi fuerint: Finally, an University which has been what Stangius made his abbey, when he turned it into a protestant colledge; Τῆς Θεογονωδὶ ἀς παιδευτῆριον καὶ Ψυχῶν διδασκαλεῖον Λογικῶν. And a river, without the streams whereof, these regions would have been meer unwatered places, for the devil!” *

* “Magnalia,” second edition, Hartford, 1820; ii., 5.

The bookmakers had surely appeared in New England, and they had come to stay. Book manufacturing in a literal and external sense had also become a Massachusetts industry; for in 1726, at Boston, in New England, B. Green and S. Kneeland printed for B. Eliot and D. Henchman a folio of more than nine hundred pages, the typographical impression being fair, and the title-page resplendent in black and red. This stately volume was nothing less, in very truth, than "A Compleat Body of Divinity, in Two Hundred and Fifty Expository Lectures on the Assembly's Shorter Catechism: wherein the Doctrines of the Christian Religion are unfolded—their Truth confirmed, their Excellence displayed, their Usefulness improved, contrary Errors and Vices refuted and exposed, Objections answered, Controversies settled, Cases of Conscience resolved; and a great Light thereby reflected on the present Age." The author was Samuel Willard, who had died in 1707, having been pastor of the Old South Church in Boston, and also having been Increase Mather's successor as head of Harvard College. Willard differed from Mather in that he resisted the anti-witchcraft persecution, and otherwise he did not submit to the Matherian sway in his position as head of a rival though friendly Boston church. Theologically, however, Willard and the Mathers were in substantial agreement, and Willard's lectures elaborately expound the prevalent creed of his time. They represent a part of the thought and work of the last two decades of the author's life; they are stately, methodical, dull; they abound in “improvements” of truth ; no one person, probably, ever heard them through, and few have read them. They cannot—and need not—be mastered entire even by the literary historian,—just as Delia Bacon’s book on Shakespeare could not be read by Hawthorne, its literary sponsor. But the huge tome has merits. As is said by Joseph Sewall and Thomas Prince, in their preface, Willard had an evenly balanced mind, a logical plan, a clear style, and some religious imagination. The expansion of the book is really due, as its editors said in apology, to its scope, and not to its style, considered sentence by sentence. Willard’s English is simpler, less pedantic, and therefore more praiseworthy than that of either of the Mathers, though it has not survived so long, for Willard’s subject was concerned neither with New England history nor with the grotesquely supernatural. He made a plain and straightforward application of his theology to practical life, and undoubtedly benefited his fellows and his immediate successors.

Meanwhile education and its corollary, literature, had appeared in Virginia. After many delays and trials, the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, was established in 1693 at Williamsburg, being the second collegiate institution within the present limits of the United States. Williamsburg, the capital city of the colony, was the centre of its political, social, and intellectual life ; at one end of its Duke of Gloucester Street stood the college ; at the other, the government building ; near by was the governor’s palace. The inhabitants fondly deemed their little city a minature London ; its muddy streets witnessed much gayety and display, and its ball-rooms were at first the most brilliant centres in the fashionable life of the South. The college, rich until the Revolution, but now decedent or dead, gave a respectable education to the youth of the colony ; the bishops of London were its chancellors, and its visitors numbered many of the influential men of Virginia. Beneath its chapel rested the bones of local magnates, and from its walls went forth men prominent in affairs. William and Mary gave Washington his surveyor's commission, and was the alma mater of three other presidents of the United States.

Near by was the first printing press in Virginia ; and some of the officers of the college, mainly Episcopalians, were writers of books and pamphlets. Of the "History of Virginia" by Stith, third president of William and Mary, we have already spoken. Still more prominent in the development of Virginian education and literature was James Blair, first president of the college, who worked for the intellectual prosperity of college and colony for more than half a century. This institution of learning was almost his individual creation, and his untiring zeal soon made it a force, though in the midst of some cavalier apathy toward education, and of a political rather than a literary tendency. He procured the charter of the college ; he wrote, as well as spoke, in its favor ; and, like so many of the early leaders, he enthusiastically and eloquently described in print the natural advantages of Virginia as a field for settlement and development. Blair had the honesty, however, to denounce its educational, social, and religious deficiencies at the end of its first century.

Samuel Willard wrote and published two hundred and fifty discourses on the Westminster Catechism ; James Blair chose a better subject for his sermons (no less than one hundred and seventeen) on the sermon of all history : Christ's on the Mount. The general helpful and didactic purpose of the works was the same ; but Blair was the more liberal of the two writers. On the opening of the college chapel, June 28, 1732, Blair preached a sermon from Prov. 22 : 6—"Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." President Blair of William and Mary and Vice-President Willard of Harvard were trainers of the young in the double capacity of preachers and teachers ; they did a good work in their " day and generation," and it is no disparagement to that work that Willard's huge folio and Blair's five volumes now sleep on the dusty shelves of a very few libraries.

Of all the Americans who wrote before the Revolution, on other than political and scientific subjects, the reputation of Cotton Mather and Jonathan Edwards stood highest in the colonies. The clergy led the intellectual life, and Mather and Edwards deeply impressed the clergy with their achievements. The renown of both spread to England, to some extent, though English literature—and even English philosophy—in the eighteenth century was too self-absorbed to pay much attention to American Congregational ministers and their weighty books.

Of the two, Edwards was in every way the greater

—in depth of learning, in the value of what he had to say, and in the external style in which he clothed his words. Philosophy, in colonial America, was the “handmaid of religion,” and Edwards was above all a religious philosopher. His training at Yale had been bent toward philosophical studies, and his sober mind eagerly followed, even in youth, the most intricate problems of “fate, free-will, foreknowledge absolute.” His independent studies supplemented the college curriculum, and soon he could teach his masters in their somewhat narrow field. Becoming a minister, of course, Edwards bravely fought the cold antinomianism of his Northampton church, which compelled him to leave and to go to Stockbridge as a pioneer worker among the Indians. In his “Humble Inquiry into the Rules of the Word of God Concerning the Qualifications Requisite to a compleat standing and full communion in the Visible Christian Church,” he demanded that real conversion and a correct life should precede admission to the Supper of the Lord. He engaged, like most of the leading ministers of his day, in active theological controversies, by sermon and pamphlet, and the courage of his convictions was ever shown, at whatever personal loss. The doctrines of original sin and of eternal punishment he vigorously proclaimed in spoken, written, and printed words. He was the New England representative and mouth-piece of the spirit of Calvin, and in a lesser way he showed the influence of Locke. To reconcile Calvinistic theology with the laws of sound thought was the life-work which he set before himself. Four years before his death (as President of Princeton College, New Jersey, in 1758) he completed in his lonely Stockbridge home that influential work on which his fame now wholly rests: "A Careful and Strict Inquiry into the modern notion of that Freedom of Will which is supposed to be essential to Moral Agency, Virtue and Vice, Praise and Blame."

The purpose of this great and long-powerful treatise, upon which Edwards lavished all his intellectual abilities, was to show that ^{Edwards} _{on the Will.} sound philosophical and theological conclusions were identical, as regards the action of the mind and will of man. Edwards' theology was Calvinistic; and the scheme of God's moral government, as described by the great Geneva divine, was, in Edwards' view, in close agreement with true theoretical philosophy, and with the observations of the scientific student. The keynote of the Edwardsian philosophy was this: "The will is not self-determined"; and he elaborately argued that all its acts must be certain, and arranged from without, or else that there could be no really ruling God in the universe. Naturally, he was obliged to defend himself against the charge of being a necessitarian, and in subsequent writings he expounded the idea of the sinfulness of sin, and declared his belief that a wicked disposition in man was his personal fault, not his misfortune. This controversy has been continued, with diminishing force, until the present day; Edwards' defenders have been many, while, of course, Arminian theologians have repudiated his results and criticised his methods of reaching them.

It has long been the custom among many to declare that Edwards' conclusions are terrible, but his logic irresistible. I believe that this opinion, like so many others in literary and philosophical criticism, is based chiefly upon hearsay and tradition, not personal study. Some competent theologians and students of mental science, after faithful investigation, have, it is true, justified his logical method, but it has been declared unsound by others equally competent. Method and result are certainly not in accord with the consensus of Protestant statements at the present day, nor with the creeds or convictions of the continuous Christianity of past history. Edwards frequently maintains that liberty is necessarily fettered, and that there can be no real freedom other than that of unintelligent indifference; and that because the mind, after an act of choice, prefers A to B, it was not in a real state of freedom as regards A and B, classed together, before its choice.* He vir-

* "Either human liberty is such that it may well stand with volitions, being necessarily connected with the views of the understanding, and so is consistent with Necessity—or it is inconsistent with and contrary to such a connexion and necessity. The former is directly subversive of the Arminian notion of liberty, consisting in freedom from all Necessity. And if the latter be chosen and it be said that liberty is inconsistent with any such necessary connexion of volition with foregoing views of the understanding, it consisting in freedom from any such Necessity of the Will as that would imply; then the liberty of the soul consists (in part, at least) in freedom from restraint, limitation, and government, in its actings, by the understanding, and in liberty and liableness to act contrary to the understanding's views and dictates: And consequently the more the soul has of this disengagedness, in its acting, the more liberty. Now let it be considered what this brings the noble principle of human liberty to, particularly when it is possessed and enjoyed in its perfection, viz.: a full and perfect freedom and liableness to act altogether at random, without the least connexion with, or restraint or government by, any dictate of reason, or any thing whatsoever apprehended, considered or viewed by the understanding; as tually declares that because a man lives in a certain town, and must go north, south, east, or west to leave it, he is therefore so conditioned in his liberty of choice that his mind has no real freedom in willing which way he will go.* Again, his pet and final being inconsistent with the full and perfect sovereignty of the Will over its own determinations. The notion mankind have conceived of liberty, is some dignity or privilege, something worth claiming. But what dignity or privilege is there, in being given up to such a wild contingency, as this, to be perfectly and constantly liable to act unintelligently and unreasonably, and as much without the guidance of understanding, as if we had none, or were as destitute of perception, as the smoke that is driven by the wind !” —“Freedom of the Will,” Part II., § 13 (p. 155 of vol. v. of Edwards’ works. Worcester, 1808).

* “ I would lay down this as an axiom of undoubted truth, that every free act is done in a state of freedom, and not after such a state. If an act of the Will be an act wherein the soul is free, it must be exerted in a state of freedom, and in the time of freedom. It will not suffice that the act immediately follows a state of Liberty ; but Liberty must yet continue, and co-exist with the act ; the soul remaining in possession of Liberty. Because that is the notion of a free act of the soul, even an act wherein the soul uses or exercises Liberty. But if the soul is not, in the very time of the act, in the possession of Liberty, it cannot at that time be in the use of it.

“ Now the question is, whether ever the soul of man puts forth an act of Will, while it yet remains in a state of Liberty, in that notion of a state of Liberty, viz., as implying a state of Indifference, or whether the soul ever exerts an act of choice or preference, while at that very time the Will is in a perfect equilibrium, not inclining one way more than another. The very putting of the question is sufficient to shew the absurdity of the affirmative answer ; for how ridiculous would it be for anybody to insist that the soul chooses one thing before another, when at the very same instant it is perfectly indifferent with respect to each ! This is the same thing as to say, the soul prefers one thing to another at the very same time that it has no preference. Choice and preference can no more be in a state of Indifference than motion can be in a state of rest, or than the preponderation of the scale of a balance can be in a state of equilibrium. Motion may be the next movement after rest, but cannot coexist with it in any, even the least part of it. So choice may be immediately after a state of Indifference, but has no coexistence with it ; even the very beginning of it is not in a state of Indifference. And therefore if this be Liberty, no act of the Will, in any degree, is ever performed in a state of Liberty, or in the time of Liberty. Volition and Liberty are so far from agreeing together and being essential to one another, that they are contrary one to another, and one ex-argument, stripped of verbiage, is this: Before any free act of will, there must ultimately be a choice of a particular freedom, which choice is in itself a strict limitation of that freedom.* To this argument Edwards turns again and again; it is his citadel. But its practical value is nil. Upon the thoughts, words, and deeds of life it exerts no effect. Before one chooses A or B, it is true, he must make up his mind which to choose; having chosen, perhaps he cannot choose the other; at any rate, he cannot have chosen other than he did choose. What follows as to his real freedom of choice in the first place? Practically nothing. Can a man, before choosing, select A or B at will? Yes, unless he is a puppet; and no cludes and destroys the other, as much as motion and rest, light and darkness, or life and death."—"Freedom of the Will," Part II., § 7 (pp. 82, 83 of vol. v. of Edwards' works. Worcester, 1808).

* "Therefore, if the Will determines all its own free acts, the soul determines all the free acts of the Will in the exercise of a Power of willing or choosing; or, which is the same thing, it determines them of choice; it determines its own acts by choosing its own acts. If the Will determines the Will, then choice orders and determines the choice; and acts of choice are subject to the decision, and follow the conduct of other acts of choice. And, therefore, if the Will determines all its own free acts, then every free act of choice is determined by a preceding act of choice, choosing that act. And if that preceding act of the Will or choice be also a free act, then, by these principles, in this act too, the Will is self-determined; that is, this, in like manner, is an act that the soul voluntarily chooses; or, which is the same thing, it is an act determined still by a preceding act of the Will, choosing that. And the like may again be observed of the last-mentioned act, which brings us directly to a contradiction; for it supposes an act of the Will preceding the first act in the whole train, directing and determining the rest; or a free act of the Will before the first free act of the Will. Or else we must come at last to an act of the Will, determining the consequent acts, wherein the Will is not self-determined, and so is not a free act, in this notion of freedom; but if the first act in the train, determining and fixing the rest, be not free, none of them all can be free; as is manifest at first view, but shall be demonstrated presently."—"Freedom of the Will," Part II., § 1 (pp. 44, 45 of Vol. v. of Edwards' works. Worcester, 1808).

subtlety or multiplication of words can make this other than fact. If the mind does not know this, it in effect knows nothing. It was by a free act that Edwards determined to write his treatise. Writing it in Stockbridge, he could not also write it elsewhere; having determined to write it, he pushed forward to the end; God knew from eternity that he would write it; and yet he might freely have written, instead, on the Westminster Catechism, like Willard, or the Sermon on the Mount, like Blair. And in spite of all its evident and potent environment, the completed volume was the work neither of chemical forces merely, nor of the Fates, nor of the pen of God.

It is not necessary to criticise further, in a history of literature, the premises, methods, or conclusions of Edwards' philosophy. Neither do I propose to dwell upon, or to present a sample of, his famous sermon on the punishment of the wicked. Edwards sincerely believed in the prevalent New England theology of his day; he argued with all his might for the doctrines of original sin, total depravity, election, and eternal punishment; so, with lesser powers, did most of the Congregational ministers of the eighteenth century. As for the famous book against the freedom of the will, Edwards bravely tried to solve an unsolvable problem. We know that we have freedom of the will, and we know that God must be more than a mere bystander in his universe,—that he foresees and controls.

“I doubt not thro' the ages one increasing purpose runs”;
but it is equally true that

“ No fate, save by the victim’s fault, is low,
 For God hath writ all dooms magnificent,

But after all criticisms have been made upon Edwards as philosopher and theologian, it remains that he strongly expressed an idea of the might and majesty of God, and of his august government of the universe. Again, some of his conclusions anticipated, and are in close agreement with, the dicta of modern science. Evolution, heredity, natural laws, as expounded by Darwin, Spencer, or Galton, teach not less truly than did Edwards the potency, almost the inflexibility, of inheritance and environment. Dr. Holmes, the most strenuous anti-Calvinist in recent American literature, in his “ Mechanism in Thought and Morals,” sometimes seems to join hands with the eighteenth-century philosopher, sprung, like himself, from sturdy Connecticut ministerial stock.

The Edwardsian theology and philosophy strongly influenced New England thought during the eighteenth century, though in a modified, and ultimately in a softened, form. The system of Edwards was taken up by three theologians, in particular : Samuel Hopkins (who studied under Edwards), Nathaniel Emmons, and Timothy Dwight (Edward’s grandson). Hopkins put forth a complete treatise on theology in a two-volume work printed at Boston in 1793 : “ The System of Doctrines contained in Divine Revelation explained and defended. Hopkinsianism ” (a slightly mitigated Edwardsianism) became a common expression in New England, just as,

later, ministers' mouths frequently expounded the difference between "Taylorism" (progressive orthodoxy) and "Tylerism" (stationary orthodoxy), which convulsed New Haven and Hartford a few years later. Dr. Hopkins was an earnest philanthropist, and fought for the abolition of slavery (still feebly existing in Rhode Island, where he aided in its overthrow). He also labored for schemes of colonization of freed blacks in Africa. Altogether, he was a power in New England religious thought, in its second stage; and not without reason, in some of the old portraits of ministers, are "divines" represented with the right hand laid on two volumes labelled "Hopkins." Dr. Emmons, who was pastor of one church in Franklin, Massachusetts, for sixty-seven years, was less influential than Hopkins, and left no formulated system; but he was in constant demand as a doctrinal preacher at ordinations, etc., when he expounded the faith substantially on Hopkinsian lines. Timothy Dwight, as able as Hopkins, and more brilliant than either Hopkins or Emmons, was the third in this triumvirate of later Calvinists. Just a quarter of a century after the appearance of Hopkins' systematic theology, President Dwight published at Middletown, Connecticut, in five volumes, "Theology Explained and Defended, in a Series of [one hundred and seventy-three] Sermons." The Unitarian controversy had begun, and Dwight earnestly championed the orthodox side; but while an Edwardsian in certain elements, he modified and popularized the system of his leader. This was the last elaborate theological treatise written in the Puritan style—a long series of sermons discussing point after point. Dwight was cultured as well as theological, and introduced into the clerical character an urbanity which it had not invariably showed, in New England. He was a reviewer, an essayist, and the author of “Travels in New England and New York.” The “literature of travel” barely belongs to literature at all; but Dwight’s descriptions do not lack interest or beauty; and they distinctly promoted the reception given to Cowper and Wordsworth in America. Of Dwight as poet something will be said in another volume of this work.

Let us turn from philosophy to philanthropy, and from a speculative theology to practical Christian work. It must be set to the lasting credit of the Puritans before 1800 that so many of them worked for the Indians, like Edwards, or the oppressed, like Mather and Hopkins. The zeal of the Master burned in their breasts, as it did in the hearts of some of the Canadian Jesuits in the seventeenth century. Thus David Brainerd, a puny student at Yale, a consumptive despondent like Cowper, terribly troubled by a perpetual habit of spiritual self-inspection, expelled from college for indiscreet revivalistic zeal, occupied his short lifetime in earnest work among the aboriginal inhabitants of Connecticut and the Middle States. Weak and dying, he spent his last months in the house of Jonathan Edwards at Northampton, where his life ended in 1747, at the age of twenty-nine. Edwards’ daughter Jerusha, eighteen years old, was his faithful nurse, nor did she long survive him. Was it a sadly tender Puritan idyl that led her, in her father's words, "to be helpful to him in his weak and low state"? If so the idyl included the idea of self-sacrifice and loving service toward a man of God; for the young people were alike in their sincere devotion to duty. On her death-bed the young girl said, her father tells us, that she had "not seen one minute for several years, wherein she desired to live one minute longer, for the sake of any other good in life, but doing good, living to God, and doing what might be for his glory." Brainerd was like-minded; Edwards says, in his Account of the Life of the Reverend Mr. David Brainerd: "Among very many other extraordinary expressions, which he then [on his death-bed] utter'd, were such as these: 'My Heaven is to please God, and glorify him, and to give all to him, and to be wholly devoted to his Glory; that is the Heaven I long for; that is my Religion, and that is my Happiness; and always was ever since I suppose I had any true Religion; and all those that are of that Religion shall meet me in Heaven. . . . It is impossible for any rational Creature to be happy without acting all for God: God himself could not make him happy any other Way. . . . There is nothing in the World worth living for but doing Good, and finishing God's work, doing the work that Christ did." This was the spirit that led Brainerd through his little life of devotion and self-sacrifice; this finally emancipated him from wicked self-analysis in the garb of piety; and this preserved and made profitable to many an American reader his celebrated "Diary," often reprinted. The book has no high literary merit, but it is the record of a faithful heart, and therefore it long kept near to the heart of American humanity. There is but one Holy Catholic Church, and its true members may be Puritan or Romanist, Waldensian or Quaker.

Another Christian diarist, as devout and earnest as Brainerd, but more serene and self-poised, and the master of a purer literary style, was the Quaker, John Woolman, 1720-1772. John Woolman. It was of him that Charles Lamb said: "Get the writings of John Woolman by heart." It would not be easy, nor, of course, would it be worth while, to memorize a journal filling two hundred and thirty printed pages, Lamb—a too-enthusiastic critic of his favorite authors—was merely saying that Woolman's Journal is pure, true, and high, and therefore, in its way, beautiful. Crabb Robinson calls it "a perfect gem"; he declares its style "of the most exquisite purity and grace;" and, best of all, Woolman's "religion was love. His whole existence and all his passions were love. If one could venture to impute to his creed, and not to his personal character, the delightful frame of mind he exhibited, one could not hesitate to be a convert." Channing, who had some personal and literary qualities like Woolman's, called the Journal beyond comparison the purest and sweetest autobiography in the language. Clearly, a Friend had won a place in American literature. The other of the two prominent American authors belonging to the Friends—John Greenleaf Whittier—says that in editing Woolman's pages (Boston edition of 1871) he was awed and solemnized by the presence of a serene and beautiful spirit.

These are strong words—too strong, I fear—about this New Jersey clerk, school-teacher, tailor, itinerant Friend, preacher, early anti-slavery advocate, all of whose writings have faded from memory save this Journal. But if we open the record at random we see a good man, living for God in the world, and ranging in his tender sympathies from little things to great. Hear him in the last year of his life, sailing to England to die :

“Second of sixth month.—Some fowls yet remained of those the passengers took for their sea-store. I believe about fourteen perished in the storms at sea by the waves breaking over the quarter-deck, and a considerable number with sickness at different times. I observed the cocks crew as we came down the Delaware, and while we were near the land, but afterwards I think I did not hear one of them crow till we came near the English coast, when they again crowed a few times. In observing their dull appearance at sea, and the pining sickness of some of them, I often remembered the Fountain of goodness, who gave being to all creatures, and whose love extends to caring for the sparrows. I believe where the love of God is verily perfected, and the true spirit of government watchfully attended to, a tenderness towards all creatures made subject to us will be experienced, and a care felt in us that we do not lessen that sweetness of life in the animal creation which the great Creator intends for them under our government.

“Fourth of sixth month.—Wet weather, high winds, and so dark that we could see but a little way. I perceived our seamen were apprehensive of the danger of missing the channel, which I understood was narrow. In a while it grew lighter, and they saw the land and knew where we were. Thus the Father of Mercies was pleased to try us with the sight of dangers, and then graciously, from time to time, deliver us from them; thus sparing our lives, that in humility and reverence we might walk before him and put our trust in him. About noon a pilot came off from Dover, where my beloved friend Samuel Emlen went on shore and thence to London, about seventy-two miles by land; but I felt easy in staying in the ship.

“Seventh of sixth month and first of the week.—A clear morning, we lay at anchor for the tide, and had a parting meeting with the ship’s company, in which my heart was enlarged in a fervent concern for them, that they may come to experience salvation through Christ. Had a head-wind up the Thames; lay sometimes at anchor; saw many ships passing, and some at anchor near; and I had large opportunity of feeling the spirit in which the poor bewildered sailors too generally live. That lamentable degeneracy which so much prevails in the people employed on the seas so affected my heart that I cannot easily convey the feeling I had to another.

“The present state of the seafaring life in general appears so opposite to that of a pious education, so full of corruption and extreme alienation from God, so full of the most dangerous examples to young people, that in looking towards a young generation I feel a care for them, that they may have an education different from the present one of lads at sea, and that all of us who are acquainted with the pure gospel spirit may lay this case to heart, may remember the lamentable corruptions which attend the conveyance of merchandise across the seas, and so abide in the love of Christ that, being delivered from the entangling expenses of a curious, delicate, and luxurious life, we may learn contentment with a little, and promote the seafaring life no further than that spirit which leads into all truth attends us in our proceedings."*

In the very year of Woolman's death was born he who sang, as it were in unconscious commemoration of this good Friend :

“ He prayeth well, who loveth well
Both man and bird and beast.

“ He prayeth best, who loveth best
All things both great and small ;
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.”

CHAPTER V.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

THE service done by Benjamin Franklin to the mind of America, in the eighteenth century, was great and high. He followed the earnest theologians who, intent upon making New England the garden of the Lord, merged the idea of the commonwealth in that of the theocracy. He preceded, in a part of his important labors, the nation-makers of the period between 1760 and 1790, who attracted the attention of European thinkers, and deeply affected the future statecraft of the world. But when colonialism was developing into nationality Franklin carried its personal message to Europe, and by his previously acquired reputation, by his learning and persistence, by his catholic ability, and most of all, perhaps, by his tact, impressed foreign diplomats and students with the idea that intellectual weight could be found in men and measures west of the Atlantic. If Franklin could have spent his life in the pursuits of science his reputation would hardly have been higher, in that general department, than it is at present. If, on the other hand, he had not spent time in scientific investigations—to him, in a sense, a recreation and avocation rather than a vocation—his diplomatic labors, his work in aiding his strong-minded contemporaries in nation-building, and his practical creation of the United States post-office, would have given him a firm reputation at a time when, in American politics, lived and worked such men as Samuel Adams, Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton, and George Washington. His personality was as strongly-marked as that of any of the five just named, and his breadth of achievement—though not of tastes—more conspicuous than that of the versatile Jefferson himself. If this seem high praise, it has been amply confirmed by a century of criticism. Franklin's faults were not few ; he was personally culpable and intellectually limited, as we shall see in this study of his character ; but when all deductions are made, the great and human figure of Franklin still arouses interest and enthusiasm in an unusual degree—largely because he was a product characteristically American.

Franklin was a Boston boy by birth, his natal day having been in the sixth year of the eighteenth century, the beginning of which ^{His youth.} seemed to mark the modern period of the world's history. His father had come from England twenty-four years before, the family being of the class which, in the somewhat aristocratic democracy of Massachusetts Bay, could be called no more than respectable. Most of the Boston notables in the eighteenth century were members of the higher families, and in due time went to Harvard College. Not such was Franklin's fortune ; he was taken from school when a little fellow of nine years and set to work to help his father in his business, that of a tallow-chandler and soap-boiler. Three years wore away in this humdrum life, when the boy became an "apprentice" in the printing-house of his brother James. At that time the periodical press was just beginning to have a real existence. Addison's Spectator had been familiar in Boston for a few years, and when James Franklin started, 1721, his New England Courant, the second American newspaper, young Franklin was minded to try to write essays of the Addison-Steele order. While lacking any systematic education, he had always been an omnivorous reader; and though few books were then available, he had sensibly selected many standards of the day, and of the rich seventeenth century. That impalpable thing which we call style he had absorbed, at least in part; and his native good-sense soon removed him from merely imitative work. The "art of putting things" in written words was really introduced by Franklin to American readers. These vigorous and readable articles in the Courant were at first contributed by Franklin without his brother's knowledge; when the secret came out James did not bestow upon the earnest young scribbler the praise which had been expected; an estrangement deepened, and the most promising lad yet born in New England sold some of his few and precious books, and late in 1723, aged seventeen, betook himself to Philadelphia, of which he was to become the most distinguished citizen.

Penniless and friendless, his trade stood him in good stead, and he found employment in the printinghouse of one Keimer, a Jew. "The printer," in those days, combined the functions of the modern publisher and editor, though the public usually learned when the printer—like Keimer—was not an intellectual force. Franklin, still a boy, soon came to have a little local renown as the brains of the Keimer establishment. So illustrious a personage, presumably, as was Sir William Keith, governor of Pennsylvania, "patronized" him, in the old-fashioned sense; and on the strength of Keith's untrustworthy promises to set him up in business, Franklin went to London in the winter of 1724-5, only to repeat his poverty-stricken Philadelphia experience. Type-setting supported him until the middle of 1726, when he returned to Philadelphia, with the promise of a clerkship, which, having got, he soon lost by the death of his employer. A year or two more with Keimer was followed by Franklin's instalment in an office of his own, his capitalist being a fellow-compositor named Meredith. This was in 1729; in the same year he bought of Keimer The Pennsylvania Gazette, a paper established to forestall a journalistic scheme of Franklin's, and boasting at the time of its purchase a subscription-list of ninety names. Franklin's Boston editorial knack was applied to the Philadelphia situation, and, indeed, to subjects of general colonial interest; and by it The Pennsylvania Gazette first made Franklin a man of note. Neither Boston nor New York could boast, at that time, a journal really rivalling this able periodical. In its columns Franklin made his mind felt as a force in many ways; and at this time, sensibly, he was remedying, by constant study of several languages, the defects of his early education.

At this period of Franklin's life it was almost as evident as it is now that he was to be a man of affairs as truly as a scholar; and that he was not to seek or to win a distinctly literary reputation. Literature for its own sake was not to be cultivated in America until more than half a century later. New England ministers had written to further the theological cause; politicians in New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and the South were soon to write that they might promote great political reforms; Franklin had already begun his voluminous and miscellaneous contributions to printed matter, but not as an author. His "works" fill a goodly row of octavos, but how miscellaneous is their character! Adams, in Boston, was ever writing to the papers in order to help his political work; Franklin wrote as a journalist, a social moralist, an early scientist, a politician, or a diplomatist, for ends implied in these words. His longest writing was his "Autobiography," and thus he showed the correctness of his own estimate of himself. That estimate was that the man Franklin stood behind all his words and deeds, and that his written and printed words, in particular, were parts of a personality, not an artistic product or series of products. The same statement applies to his few orations. The work of the newspaper writer, the man of scientific pursuits, the statesman, the orator, or even the almanac-maker, may approach literature, and may become a part of literature; but the aims and attainments of the working force, within or without literature, and of the man of letters, are not to be subjected to the same standards.

It would be easy to make long quotations from Franklin's Addisonian Essays,* and to show from them that he possessed a pleasant style, a due share of wit, a helpful purpose to reform Philadelphia foibles and follies, a well-read mind, a touch of pathos, and some other qualities deemed necessary to equip a member of The Spectator's school. But nearly all of the great body of imitators of Steele and Addison are now unread, and their amiable lucubrations are forgotten. If Doctor Johnson as essayist is neglected by his nineteenth-century readers, while Doctor Johnson the man is one of the best-known figures in English literary history, Doctor Franklin need not complain if he has met a similar fate. Indeed, the parallel is somewhat close, though Johnson considered himself one of the first authors, as well as first forces, of his time, while Franklin was much more modest. The truth about Franklin as a miscellaneous writer—a truth which any one may verify by a day's reading in his collected works—is that most of his productions, while respectable, of wide range, well-written, sensible, and telling, are not of the highest rank, and that, measured by the tests of English literature between 1725 and 1775, they are commonplace. From the several editions of his works but three things stand out because of inherent literary merit :

* Such, for instance, as those entitled The Busy-Body, contributed by him to The Weekly Mercury, 1729, published in Philadelphia by Andrew Bradford—a rival of Keimer.

his "Autobiography," his highly important papers on electricity, and the maxims in "Poor Richard's Almanac"—the last being chief and sufficient in themselves to perpetuate his fame as a writer.

The almanac, however popular and however indispensable, is not usually considered the highest or most permanent form of literature. It was the achievement of Benjamin Franklin to give to his series of "Poor Richard's Almanac" (begun in 1733) a reputation both national and lasting; and to make it, actually, a means of social education. "Wise saws and modern instances" still form an indispensable part of the almanac, and Franklin showed a knack in making proverbs that not only put his rivals out of sight, but, so far as they went, showed him to be worthy of mention beside his transatlantic contemporary, Alexander Pope. As an almanac-seer, Franklin was neither a pioneer nor a creator; he adapted freely, but he used, by original and quoted words, a medium of popular instruction as it had not been used before. Benjamin Franklin, printer, as "Richard Saunders, Philomath," for a quarter of a century provided the people with saws, proverbs, and bits of homely advice which were conned and repeated by thousands, and so effectively taught principles of common-sense, economy, and prudence that they actually increased Philadelphia's stock of ready money, and helped to make its vicinity the home of frugality and "forehandedness." Ten thousand copies made a great circulation for those days; and the pamphlets were worn to pieces by their eager owners.

What sort of wisdom did Franklin teach in these homely pages? "Never leave that till to-morrow which you can do to-day." "One to-day is worth two to-morrows." "God helps them that help themselves." "Plough deep while sluggards sleep." "Dost thou love life, then do not squander time, for that is the stuff life is made of." "Three removes are as bad as a fire." "Little boats should keep near shore." "Little strokes fell large oaks." "He that goes a-borrowing goes a-sorrowing." "Creditors have good memories." "If you would have a faithful servant and one that you like, serve yourself." "The cat in gloves catches no mice." "Who dainties love shall beggars prove." "Fools make feasts and wise men eat them." "Though I had first determined to buy stuff for a new coat, I went away resolved to wear my old one a little longer." By such aphorisms, invented or adapted, Franklin strove to help his fellows. Their general drift is expressed in the famous dictum, which Franklin did not invent, but which is popularly credited to him, that "Honesty is the best policy." "Poor Richard" gave little advice that could be accounted spiritual or ideal. His aim was to make people frugal, industrious, and prudent—worldly-wise in the better sense. If we look to him for what he did not pretend to offer—for what, indeed, his very nature made it impossible to offer—we are disappointed. If we turn to him as a "guide, philosopher, and friend," in the practical and commonplace affairs of life, we get useful counsel from his every-day wisdom. His method we shall find reproduced, and in some ways improved, by one or two later American humorists, as, indeed, it had been anticipated, in a certain degree, from the days of Solomon and the sages of Greece.

“Poor Richard’s Almanac” is but one of the productions of Franklin which emphasize the fact that he was a man of remarkable versatility. Not even the two great Mathers had a broader range, or were fonder of dabbling in all learning, and neither of the Mathers equalled Franklin in sound sense or catholicity of spirit. Cotton Mather, as a theologian, indeed, was as learned as was Franklin in his capacity of statesman or of scientist; but Mather’s work has been largely superseded, while Franklin’s has been developed. Mather worked sincerely for his kind, and wrote a practical book to which Franklin himself acknowledged deep indebtedness: “Bonifacius,” “an essay upon the good that is to be devised and designed, with proposals of unexceptionable methods to do good in the world.” But Franklin put these beneficent principles into practice more successfully than could Mather. “What he has said, I will do”; said the second orator in a stump-debate in the country; and so Franklin seems to say by his deeds. To develop journalism; to make people industrious and frugal; to start the first American magazine (The General Magazine and Historical Chronicle, Philadelphia, 1741); to secure the opening of a library in Philadelphia (1721); to promote the establishment of the American Philosophical Society (1743) and the University of Pennsylvania (1749); to organize a postal system for the colonies a quarter of a century before their independence ; to draw up plans for colonial union ; to be a leader in Congress ; to aid in the preparation of the Declaration of Independence, which he signed ; to make the new little country respected in European courts ; and to sit in the Constitutional Convention of 1787—all this, surely, was sufficient honor for Franklin, who seemed to become the Bonifacius of whom Mather had dreamed. And in his great electrical experiments, showing that lightning is electricity, and inventing the lightning-rod, he worked toward giving the world a benefit scarcely less than that conferred by Watt and Stephenson. He was no theologian, as his youthful “Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity” (London, 1725) proved to him clearly enough, by his own subsequent statement ; but the “works side” of faith he made very serviceably manifest. And, with all his practicality, he was a philosopher, both in the old-fashioned American sense of the word (meaning physicist) and in the correct signification. If his philosophy was not very ambitious nor very ideal, it was serviceable to its time. Franklin the scientist was esteemed by Buffon ; Franklin the statesman was called “the genius which has freed America,” by Mirabeau ; but Franklin the writer also won the praise of Hume, who naturally liked a man having, in his utilitarianism, some points of mental kinship with himself.

It was impossible, in view of his personal character and the needs of the times, that Franklin should not enter, and remain in, public life. With the affairs of city, colony, and nation he became closely connected. In 1736 he began his political work as clerk of the Pennsylvania Assembly or Legislature, of which he soon afterward became a member. In 1737 he became deputy-postmaster of Philadelphia, and started for that city the first regular fire-company and police-force that the colonies could boast. Street-paving, the care of the sick, the organization of the soldiery, and many miscellaneous works of the sort, owed much to his helping hand. By 1754, says his most competent editor and biographer,* Franklin "had become the most important man in the colony of Pennsylvania." In that year, at a conference of commissioners of the colonies at Albany, to consult as to means of defence in the difficulties with France, Franklin prepared a plan for colonial union (with a president-general appointed by the king, and an elected general council) which, though not adopted, foreshadowed the events of twenty years later. In 1757, the Pennsylvania Assembly having come to a serious disagreement with the "proprietors" of Pennsylvania, Thomas Penn and Richard Penn, sons of William, Franklin was sent to London as a special commissioner to plead the Assembly's cause. The Penns had demanded that, in the taxation to support British troops during the French-and-Indian war in America, their own estates be exempt; Franklin secured, in the face of a hostile king and ministry, a stipulation that only the unsurveyed lands of the Penns should be untaxed. The right of a colonial assembly to tax all colonial residents, and, indeed, to have its tax-laws obeyed, was included in this compromise. While in England on this mission Franklin received the honorary title (from the University of St. Andrews) which made him Doctor Franklin for the rest of his days. His journalistic taste for pamphleteering led him to put forth, in 1760, an argument, in the garb of historical fiction, for the continuance of the war with France; and a similar paper was influential in leading the British ministry to retain its Canadian possessions. At that time some were arguing that colonies were a drain on the mother-country, which broad proposition Franklin denied. The future of British commerce, and the populous nation to grow up in the New World, he plainly foresaw and vigorously foretold.

Returning home in 1762, Franklin, having lost his seat in the Assembly through the opposition of the Penns, was nevertheless sent to London Franklin and the Stamp Act. once more, in the matter of the continued difficulties with the proprietaries, which, in the face of grave complications precluding the Revolution, were not to be settled until the State of Pennsylvania ultimately bought their rights. At this time the world-famous "stamp-act" had been proposed, whereby the colonists were to be taxed without representation, toward the expenses of the just-closed French war. Franklin worked hard to prevent the passage of the act, but urged making the best of it when it had been adopted by Parliament. The measure was so intensely unpopular in the colonies that even this conservatism put Franklin somewhat out of favor. In 1765, however, Parliament re-examined the question, and Franklin gave clear and cogent testimony before it, on the stamp-matter and American affairs in general. This testimony undoubtedly caused the repeal of the act, and Franklin's American popularity rose to more than its former height. He was more than beloved, he was trusted. Subsequent taxation, imposed by the angry Tories, of course embittered America once more, but took away nothing from the honor paid to Franklin. During his ten-year stay in England, as accredited agent of Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Georgia, he strove zealously for compromise and conciliation, but always as an American patriot, and in opposition to Parliamentary law-making for colonies. Having exhausted his powers and lost his favor in London, he returned to Philadelphia in 1775, just after the battles of Lexington and Concord.

He was in time to take an active part in Revolutionary measures. At once elected to the Franklin in the Revolution. Continental Congress, he became one of its trusted leaders, rendering great service in committees and on the floor, and organizing, as post-master-general, the colonial postal service which was afterwards developed into the complete inter-colonial system. A little later he went to Canada, in an unsuccessful attempt to enlist Canadian aid in the war; and, as has been said, he was one of the committee whence came the Declaration of Independence. Having presided over the first constitutional convention of the new State of Pennsylvania, he was elected (late in the memorable year of 1776) member of a committee to go to France and try to win the sympathy and help of that nation. His associates were John Adams and Arthur Lee. In Paris he was already the best ^{His French mission.} known American, and shared the renown accorded to the most eminent scientists of France itself. On his arrival, charged with an extraordinary mission, representing political ideas already dear to many Frenchmen, and seeming to them the incarnation of anti-English sentiment, his popularity rose to a height which would have turned the head of a weaker man. In 1777 the Franco-American alliance was formed, of course largely through his influence; in 1778 he became American minister to France; and thereafter his services in continuing the friendly union, and in securing loans from France to the United States, were important. Seeking to resign in 1781, because of age and ill-health, Congress refused to accept the resignation, and Franklin continued to serve his country. To his former work was added the task (with John Adams and John Jay) of negotiating peace with Great Britain. Not often is any nation represented by an abler committee. The various steps towards the peace were taken, and in 1785 Franklin returned home, being succeeded in France by Thomas Jefferson. His general reception was that due to his attainments, services, and now venerable age; and he was soon in the harness again, as "President of Pennsylvania," and member of the ^{The Constitution of the United States.} Constitutional Convention of 1787. The adopted governmental scheme giving the States equal representation in the Senate, while the membership of the House of Representatives is based on population, was Franklin's. The sage died April 17, 1790, aged eighty-four.

This active life is, in part, faithfully and entertainingly chronicled in his autobiography, which, next to his Poor Richard sayings, has done much to spread and perpetuate his fame among many people in many lands. With him the habit of writing was inveterate; his papers cover all sorts of subjects, from aeronautics to the taxation of the Colonies; from the properties of electricity to the restraints that should be set around luxury; from privateering to the principles affecting the spread of population. He was a conservative radical; a thrifty and afterward rich handicraftsman; a moralist who tried to atone for his early immoralities; a statesman lacking the highest ambition, and almost destitute of idealism and spirituality, but with hands unstained with avarice or self-seeking. His pen-portrait of himself could hardly fail to be interesting; one American critic* even claims that "the perennial charm of his autobiography is like that of Robinson Crusoe." The book was current for years in a wretchedly-edited and manifestly imperfect edition; and it was not until 1868 that an authoritative text was put before the public. John Bigelow, one of Franklin's successors at the French court, secured the original manuscript three quarters of a century after the writer's death, and has twice issued corrected editions. This manuscript has had a curious history; the long-current edition (edited by William Temple Franklin, grandson) was printed from a copy; and many impressions issued in London, Dublin, Paris, New York, etc., were of various degrees of inaccuracy. Mr. Bigelow intimates that the British government, by money stipend perhaps, induced William Temple Franklin to delay the issue of his grandfather's works. But the whole story, now that a good text is available, belongs to bibliography, not literary history.

Let us look, in a few extracts from the autobiography, at the man and the author whom Edward Laboulaye calls a "born moralist," "kind-hearted, a devoted patriot, and one of the sincerest sons of humanity," and whom a certain American, Jefferson Davis, has declared* to be "the incarnation of the peddling tuppenny Yankee."

DEAR SON:—I have ever had pleasure in obtaining any little anecdotes of my ancestors. You may remember the inquiries I made among the remains of my relations when you were with me in England, and the journey I undertook for that purpose. lin wrote "The Auto-biography." Imagining it may be equally agreeable to you to know the circumstances of my life, many of which you are yet unacquainted with, and expecting the enjoyment of a week's uninterrupted leisure in my present country retirement, I sit down to write them for you. To which I have besides some other inducements. Having emerged from the poverty and obscurity in which I was born and bred, to a state of affluence and some degree of reputation in the world, and having gone so far through life with a considerable share of felicity, the conducting means I made use of, which, with the blessing of God, so well succeeded, my posterity may like to know, as they may find some of them suitable to their own situations, and therefore fit to be imitated. That felicity, when I reflected on it, has induced me sometimes to say, that were it offered to my choice, I should have no objection to a repetition of the same life from its beginning, only asking the advantages authors have in a second edition to correct some faults of the first. So I might, besides correcting the faults, change some sinister actions and events of it for others more favorable. But though this were denied, I should still accept the offer. Since such a repetition is not to be expected, the next thing like living one's life over again seems to be a recollection of that life, and to make that recollection as durable as possible by putting it down in writing.

And now I speak of thanking God. I desire with all God and humility to acknowledge that I owe the men-
man. tioned happiness of my past life to His kind providence, which led me to the means I used and gave them success. My belief in this induces me to hope, though I must not presume, that the same goodness will still be exercised toward me, in continuing that happiness, or enabling me to bear a fatal reverse, which I may experience as others have done; the complexion of my future fortune being known to Him only in whose power it is to bless to us even our afflictions.

At Palmer's [printing-house, London, 1725] I was employed in composing [setting type] for a philosophical venture at the age of nineteen. second edition of Wollaston's "Religion of Nature." Some of his reasonings not appearing to me well founded, I wrote a little metaphysical piece in which I made remarks on them. It was entitled a "Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity, Pleasure and Pain." I inscribed it to my friend Ralph;

I printed a small number. It occasioned my being more considered by Mr. Palmer as a young man of some ingenuity, tho' he seriously expostulated with me upon the principles of my pamphlet, which to him appeared abominable. My printing this tract was another erratum.* . . . My pamphlet by some means falling into the hands of one Lyons, a surgeon, author of a book entitled "The Infallibility of Human Judgment," it occasioned an acquaintance between us. He took great notice of me, called on me often to converse on those subjects, carried me to the Horns, a pale ale-house in — Lane, Cheapside, and introduced me to Dr. Mandeville, author of "The Fable of the Bees," who had a club there, of which he was the soul, being a most facetious, entertaining companion. Lyons, too, introduced me to Dr. Pemberton, at Batson's coffee-house, who promised to give me an opportunity, some time or other, of seeing Sir Isaac Newton, of which I was extremely desirous; but this never happened.

Before I enter upon my public appearance in business, it may be well to let you know the then state of my mind with regard to my principles and morals, that you may see how far those influenc'd the future events of my life. My parents had early given me religious impressions, and brought me through my childhood piously in the Dissenting way. But I was scarce fifteen, when, after doubting by turns of several points, as I found them disputed in the different books I read, I began to doubt of Revelation itself. Some books against Deism fell into my hands; they were said to be the substance of sermons preached at Boyle's Lectures. It happened that they wrought an effect on me quite contrary to what was intended by them ; for the arguments of the Deists, which were quoted to be refuted, appeared to me much stronger than the refutations ; in short, I soon became a thorough Deist. My arguments perverted some others, particularly Collins and Ralph ; but, each of them having wrong'd me greatly without the least compunction, and recollecting Keith's conduct towards me (who was another free-thinker), and my own towards Vernon and Miss Read, which at times gave me great trouble, I began to suspect that this doctrine, tho' it might be true, was not very useful. My London pamphlet, which had for its motto these lines of Dryden :

* Only a hundred copies were printed, of which a few were given away, and the rest burned. Franklin afterward grew "disgusted" with metaphysical reasoning. Mr. Bigelow, in his edition of the Autobiography, here adds a note to the effect that "no copy of this tract is now known to be in existence."

Sees but a part o' the chain, the nearest link :
His eyes not carrying to the equal beam

and from the attributes of God, his infinite wisdom, goodness, and power, concluded that nothing could possibly be wrong in the world, and that vice and virtue were empty distinctions, no such things existing, appeared now not so clever a performance as I once thought it ; and I doubted whether some error had not insinuated itself unperceiv'd into my argument, so as to infect all that follow'd, as is common in metaphysical reasonings.

I grew convinc'd that truth, sincerity and integrity in Franklin's dealings between man and man were of the later philosophy of life. utmost importance to felicity of life ; and I form'd written resolutions, which still remain in my journal book, to practice them ever while I lived. Revelation had indeed no weight with me, as such ; but I entertain'd an opinion that, though certain actions might not be bad because they were forbidden by it, or good because it commanded them, yet probably those actions might be forbidden because they were bad for us, or commanded because they were beneficial to us, in their own natures, all the circumstances of things considered. And this persuasion, with the kind hand of Providence, or some guardian angel, or accidental favorable circumstances and situations, or all together, preserved me, thro' this dangerous time of youth, and the hazardous situations I was sometimes in among strangers, remote from the eye of my father, without any willful gross immorality or injustice, that might have been expected from my want of religion. I say willful, because the instances I have mentioned had something of necessity in them, from my youth, inexperience, and the knavery of others. I had therefore a tolerable character to begin the world with; I valued it properly and determined to preserve it.

Franklin was immoral in his youth; his only son was illegitimate; he repented of his fault, made such reparation as he could, and lived a better life; his early deism (to use the old term) became a reverential theism; but the most charitable judgment cannot call him a spiritual man. His religious attitude is of great interest, preceding, as it did, such important movements in Europe and America. He respected all forms of religion, in their essentials; did not strive to undermine others' opinions of the advantages of their peculiar beliefs; and, though he "seldom attended any public worship," he regularly paid his church subscription. He disagreed specially with the Calvinists, and was once greatly disgusted because no morality was preached in a sermon on the text: "Whatsoever things are true," etc. After this sermon he stayed at home and used a "little Liturgy or form of prayer, entitled, Articles of Belief and Acts of Religion," which he had composed in 1728. Much later, however, he advised his daughter to go to church and use the prayer-book, even if she disliked the sermon or the preacher. "I never doubted," says he, "the existence of the Deity ; that he made the world, and govern'd it by his Providence ; that the most acceptable service of God was the doing good to man ; that our souls are immortal ; and that all crime will be punished, and virtue rewarded, either here or hereafter." This little creed, which he deemed the essential part of all religions, led him to respect the churches according as they conformed to it and made few useless additions to it ; and it lay at the root of his well-known simplicity, industry, and frugality, of which many naive and amusing records are given in the "Autobiography."

Such a moralist, accustomed to write maxims for the guidance of others, of course drew up from time to time, especially in youth, schemes for self-regulation,—at one time he even "conceiv'd the bold and arduous project of arriving at moral perfection." This failing, he set before him the task of "acquiring the habitude" of such virtues (thirteen in all) as the following, for example :

1. Temperance. Eat not to dullness ; drink not to ele-Franklin's list of virtues. vation.—2. Silence. Speak not but what may benefit others or yourself ; avoid trifling conversation.—4. Resolution. Resolve to perform what you ought ; perform without fail what you resolve.—5. Frugality. Make no expense but to do good to others or yourself ; i. e., waste nothing.—Industry. Lose no time ; be always employ'd in something useful ; cut off all unnecessary actions.—9. Moderation. Avoid extreams ; forbear resenting injuries so much as you think they deserve.—11. Tranquillity. Be not disturbed at trifles, or at accidents common or unavoidable.—13. Humility. Imitate Jesus and Socrates.

A bright Frenchwoman once said to me, with reference to the petition "Thy will be done," in the Lord's Prayer: "Whysay any more? that is enough." Similarly, one might say that Franklin's fourth rule included "the whole duty of man." But this patient and methodical arrangement of life was not exactly like the inspection of one's spiritual ilia in which so many conscientious religionists have indulged in all ages; and it certainly proved beneficial to himself and his fellows. Franklin possessed not a spark of the fire which burned in Dante or Savonarola, but his life-success can be summed up in the words: he made the most of himself.

His religious opinions may be dismissed with one more quotation—an "intended creed" for a possible new sect or school projected by Franklin, and never deemed impracticable by him, if one man should throw heart and soul into its propagation. This creed, he thought, contained "the essentials of every known religion," and was free from every thing that might shock the professors of any religion. It was:

That there is one God, who made all things.

That he governs the world by his providence. Franklin's universal creed.

That he ought to be worshiped by adoration, prayer, and thanksgiving.

But that the most acceptable service of God is doing good to man.

That the soul is immortal.

And that God will certainly reward virtue and punish vice either here or hereafter.

On this solid basis the "Autobiography"—and the life it chronicled—went busily and cheerily on. The book tells us how Franklin organized a city watch and fire company in Philadelphia; started an academy and a philosophical society; experimented with electricity; invented the open stove still called after his name, and refused to take a patent for it; worked up from the Philadelphia common-council to the Continental Congress, and diplomacy, and treaty-making; concocted plans for a death-dealing militia on the one hand, and hospitals and hygienic street-cleaning on the other; refused to become Colonel Franklin or General Franklin, but rejoiced in the peaceable honors of A.M. and LL.D., the first being given by Harvard and Yale "in consideration of my improvements and discoveries in the electric branch of natural philosophy"; received the Copley medal and became a member of the Royal Society, being "excus'd the customary payments, which would have amounted to twenty-five guineas"; and so on, in things great and small. The book is a fragment, but it is a fragment which has formed the basis of all the many biographies of Franklin. It is idle to compare the "Autobiography" with "Robinson Crusoe," as a piece of literature, but it certainly is wholesome and appetizing reading. Benjamin Franklin the author cannot be rated among writers of the first class; but it is seldom that the good motions of the world get jogged along by so sturdy and helpful a force as was Benjamin Franklin the man.

CHAPTER VI.

POLITICAL LITERATURE.

THE American literature which we have thus far studied is now interesting in many ways, Early American literature and European readers. and was not less interesting at the time of its first appearance. Much of it—as well as a considerable body of writing now justly forgotten or ignored—was regarded with pride by authors and readers alike. In poetry there were “tenth muses”; in theology there were mighty makers of systems; in the “literature of travel” there were pretentious chroniclers and resonant describers. It should not be forgotten, however, that these local magnates were little esteemed abroad. Speculators, geographers, and a part of the general public might read some of the wonderful accounts of life and scenery in the new world. Now and then a theologian purchased and studied one of the folios or less ambitious pamphlets produced by American divines. But the great mass of American literary productions had none but a home market. It will be remembered that thus far we have found not one American book of the first literary rank. Benjamin Franklin’s great European reputation was personal, not literary; he was esteemed and listened to as diplomat, scientist, individual force, not man of letters. Jonathan Edwards' famous treatise, so potent at home, made no great stir abroad, and the interest aroused by it in England and Scotland, such as it was, of course depended upon its philosophical merit, not its literary. As a mere piece of writing, indeed, its rank was not high.

But we come now to a class of literature which was perforce read and studied in Europe. American political writing. Thinking men might ignore the American traveller, theologian, poet, but the American political orator spoke so that his words resounded across the Atlantic; and the authors of the political literature of the colonies and the nascent nation did not lack distant readers. Their foreign students, to be sure, heeded less their manner than their matter. It was the American word, not the American grace that won attention; but henceforth one division of the growing literature of the west was to have its attentive public. When we consider the state and the wealth of English literature in the seventeenth century, and even in the eighteenth, it is at once apparent that London, Oxford, and Edinburgh had no need to concern themselves with the comparatively weak and poor books and pamphlets coming from America. But when American orators and politicians were attacking cherished British traditions, and threatening to curtail or destroy British power in the New World, it became necessary to listen to what they were saying, and either to accept or to repel the force of their words.

The most potent voice in Massachusetts was that of Samuel Adams, a Harvard graduate of 1740, a patriot and radical from his youth, intensely in earnest, poor and incorruptible, a man of business who sacrificed private gains to the good of the colonial cause. The Saxon folk-mote, transferred to England, and thence to the American colonies, became the New England town-meeting. Boston was the chief New England town, and of the assembly of its citizens Samuel Adams was the natural leader. No other American had so good an opportunity to mould the form of a democracy in its best condition, and Adams made the most of his opportunity. A Calvinistic Congregationalist in religion, he applied to politics the principles of equality upon which he insisted in church order. Boston was somewhat leavened with aristocratic and Tory tendencies; against both he fought with a vigor which finally triumphed. To him fell a work in the North like that done by Thomas Jefferson in the South. Democratic principles carried too far become communistic; but extreme Federalism endangers the rights of the people. In the latter Adams saw the greater danger; and his work, fortunately, came at a time when the centrifugal force was more needed than the centripetal. He lived too soon to reap the highest political rewards in the new nation which owed so much to his efforts; and, indeed, when political parties appeared after the Revolution, Adams was more radical than the average New England voter; though he became State legislator, congressman, and governor. His work was that of a strong personal force, a pioneer, a destroyer of oppression, an upbuilder of liberty. He was the central figure in the town-meeting; he framed and voiced its policy; he drew up important instructions or appeals to home and foreign officers or legislators; and his pen was almost constantly in his hand, for he wrote stirring articles for the people's newspaper in Boston. His signatures were many; now he was "Vindex," now "Valerius Poplicola," now "A Son of Liberty," but the purport of his utterances was ever the same. In his speeches, epistles, or memorials he put the spirit before the letter, the matter before the manner. What wonder that his force made him as obnoxious to the home government as he was popular among the colonists? When a general pardon was offered the patriots, the year before the Revolution, Adams was excepted, and was proud of the fact. His course was unswerving from first to last. When he presented his thesis as Master of Arts, at the age of twenty-one, he debated the question: "Whether it be Lawful to resist the Supreme Magistrate, if the Commonwealth cannot otherwise be preserved"; and this question his life-work answered in the affirmative. He was the "chief incendiary," said the Tories; the truest of patriots, thought the colonists.

Few now read Adams' "True Sentiments of America," "Circular Letter (1768) to each colonial legislature," "Appeal to the World," "Vindex" letters, or "Earnest Appeal to the People" (February, 1776, for independence). No collected edition of his writings—scattered and almost inaccessible—exists. But his intensity of thought, now calm, now fiery, his vigor of utterance, and his purpose in written or spoken words, entitle him to some mention in a literary as well as a political history of America. When need was, he could write such finished sentences as this : " There is an English affection in the colonists towards the mother country, which will forever keep them connected with her to every valuable purpose, unless it shall be erased by repeated unkind usage on her part." The very next year (March 18, 1769) he wrote to the Providence Gazette his first portent of the division of the British nation :

When I consider the corruption of Great Britain,—their load of debt,—their intestine divisions, tumults, and riots,—their scarcity of provisions,—and the Contempt in which they are held by the nations about them; and when I consider, on the other Hand, the State of the American Colonies with Regard to the various Climates, Soils, Produce, rapid Population, joined to the virtue of the Inhabitants,—I cannot but think that the Conduct of Old England towards us may be permitted by Divine Wisdom, and ordained by the unsearchable providence of the Almighty, for hastening a period dreadful to Great Britain.

Six years later the period came, and in 1776 Adams signed the Declaration of Independence, drawn up by his life-long friend and hearty admirer, Thomas Jefferson, and warmly favored by himself. His name, in point of time, may well stand at the head of the honorable list of American orators and statesmen who have contributed to literature. Many have surpassed him in distinctly literary reputation, and in the continued publication and circulation of their writings ; few have been so influential in achieving to the full the aspirations of their lives.

The pre-Revolution orators and political writers of greatest ability and success were Samuel Adams, James Otis, and Josiah Quincy, Junior, in the North, and Patrick Henry in the South. Of these the work of Adams and Henry was the most solidly effective, but the immediate oratorical reputation of Otis was the greatest—certainly the greatest among the many Massachusetts speakers. Otis, like Joseph Warren, was sometimes hasty, outstripping in his zeal even the radical Adams; sometimes he veered to conservatism; and the latter part of his life was overshadowed by increasing insanity. But in his prime he was esteemed the chief orator of the Revolutionary movement. His fat figure was not ungraceful; his plump face was courtly and handsome; his voice was strong and well modulated; his eye was piercing; and he was likened by the elder President Adams to “a flame of fire.” Of the speech delivered by Otis in 1760, when Lieutenant-Governor Hutchinson had been appointed chief-justice, and was likely to favor the “writs of assistance” (promoting search for dutiable goods), Adams said: “With a promptitude of classical allusions, a depth of research, a rapid summary of historical events and dates, a profusion of legal authorities, a prophetic glance of his eye into futurity, and a torrent of impetuous eloquence, he hurried away every thing before him. American independence was then and there born; the seeds of patriots and heroes were then and there sown, to defend the vigorous youth, the non sine diis animosus infans. Every man of a crowded audience appeared to me to go away, as I did, ready to take arms against writs of assistance. Then and there was the first scene of the first act of opposition to the arbitrary claims of Great Britain.”

This five-hour speech against taxation without representation was a potent effort, but it cannot fairly be said that American independence was born on the utterance of Otis' flaming oration. Independence was a growth, not belonging alone to Otis, Adams, Jefferson, or Henry; not born at Boston, Philadelphia, or Williamsburg. But a great force must have rested in the oratory of one who commanded wild applause whenever he appeared, and who seemed to the colonists a veritable Pitt the elder. He was neither consistent nor discreet, but the public, often inconsistent and indiscreet, is apt to favor a spokesman of similar temper. Like Charles Sumner, the great Boston orator of the later century, he was dictatorial and vain, and like Sumner, he was made more popular by an unjust personal assault which he suffered. His eccentricities and misfortunes actually increased his temporary influence, and the public reluctantly gave up his leadership, even when his insanity was manifest. “He was like the huge cannon on the man-of-war, in Victor Hugo's story, that had broken from its moorings in the storm, and become a terror to those whom it formerly defended.” *

Otis' reputation, like that of so many orators, is largely a matter of tradition. One of his best speeches, in popular estimation, was written by

* J. K. Hosmer: “Life of Samuel Adams,” p. 355.

Lydia Maria Child long after his death, and printed in her novel, "The Rebels." His pamphlet called a "Vindication of the Conduct of the House of Representatives" (1762), pithily put the arguments which the colonies were to continue to advance for twenty years, by pen and sword. Two years later he put forth his "Rights of the British Colonists Asserted and Proved," from which I will quote that celebrated single sentence into which the author compressed his argument (not accepted by Samuel Adams) for colonial representation :

The sum of my argument is, that civil government is of God, that the administrators of it were originally the whole people: that they might have devolved it on whom they pleased: that this devolution is fiduciary, for the good of the whole: that by the British constitution this devolution is on the king, lords, and commons, the supreme, sacred, and uncontrollable legislative power, not only in the realm, but through the dominions: that by the abdication, the original compact was broken to pieces: that by the revolution it was renewed, and more firmly established, and the rights and liberties of the subject in all parts of the dominions more fully explained and confirmed: that in consequence of this establishment and the acts of succession and union, his Majesty George III. is rightful king and sovereign, and with his parliament, the supreme legislative of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging: that this constitution is the most free one, and by far the best now existing on earth: that by this constitution, every man in the dominions is a free man: that no part of his Majesty's dominions can be taxed without their consent: that every part has a right to be represented in the supreme or some subordinate legislature: that the refusal of this would seem to be a contradiction in practice to the theory of the constitution: that the colonies are subordinate dominions, and are now in such a state, as to make it best for the good of the whole that they should not only be continued in the enjoyment of subordinate legislation, but be also represented in some proportion to their number and estate in the grand legislation of the nation: that this would firmly unite all parts of British empire, in the greatest peace and prosperity; and render it invulnerable and perpetual.

In the reported speeches by Otis there is less rhetorical elaboration than in this series of statements, drawn up for publication; and his spoken sentences were strengthened by an enthusiasm and personal force of which we now know only by tradition. The knot of Massachusetts orators of whom Otis was chief, were men of education, social standing, and marked ability; their cause was the cause of popular rights; and their burning words fell upon minds ready to catch every new influence against English oppression. The Tory or Loyalist party in Massachusetts did not lack men of integrity and intellectual strength, such as Governor Hutchinson, the historian; but the balance inclined heavily upon the other side. If Adams had possessed Otis' silver-tongued mastery of the multitude, or if Otis had shared Adams' dogged determination and ability as a manager, the renown of either would have been still more lasting, in the realm of political oratory. As it is, however, while the speeches of neither take literary rank with those of Chatham, Burke, or even Patrick Henry, among their contemporaries, their rhetorical triumphs were immediate and lasting, if rhetoric be, as it used to be defined, the "art of persuasive oratory." They were orators who persuaded their hearers to undertake or share the most influential political and military movement of modern history. It must have seemed to Massachusetts men a touch of kinship and a heavenly sign of reward when their pet orator Otis, the "flame of fire," met instantaneous death by a lightning-stroke.

The young men of Massachusetts, like Joseph Warren and Josiah Quincy, Junior, sprang into the forum with an earnestness equal to that of their elders. The words of Quincy seem to modern readers more intense and more artlessly artistic than those of Otis. "In defence of our civil and religious rights," exclaimed young Quincy at the age of Josiah Quincy, Jr., 1744-1775. twenty-three, eight years before the Revolution began, "we dare oppose the world; with the God of armies on our side, even the God who fought our fathers' battles, we fear not the hour of trial, though the hosts of our enemies should cover the field like locusts. If this be enthusiasm, we will live and die enthusiasts." These words were not spoken, but printed in the Boston organ of the colonial spirit. Quincy, worn out by consumption, died at sea, in sight of the Massachusetts shore, just after the battles of Concord and Lexington; but Warren really fell an "enthusiast" at Bunker Hill. "If we have any respect for things sacred; any regard to the dearest treasure on earth; if we have one tender sentiment for posterity; if we would not be despised by the whole world, let us, in the most open, solemn manner, and with determined fortitude, swear,—we will die,—if we cannot live freemen.” Quincy thus wrote eight years before Patrick Henry, in Virginia, flung forth those resonant words : “ Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take ; but, as for me, give me liberty, or give me death ! ” Quincy was even willing to be called traitor, if it be for his cause : “ If to appear for my country is treason, and to arm for her defence is rebellion,—like my fathers, I will glory in the name of rebel and traitor, as they did in that of puritan and enthusiast.” “ Neither can it taint the unblemished honor of a son of freedom, though he should make his departure on the already prepared gibbet, or be dragged to the newly-erected scaffold for execution. . . . A crown of joy and immortality shall be his reward. The history of his life his children shall venerate.” No American patriot met his death on the scaffold ; had one thus died, his countrymen would have seen heaven’s light descending upon his head, as in the pencil-picture which Victor Hugo drew of John Brown’s hanging. But Quincy was no hot-headed communist ; his advice was, of course, intensely earnest ; but without such counsel and such determination the Revolution must have been a failure. Said he : “ To hope for the protection of Heaven, without doing our duty, and exerting ourselves as becomes men, is to mock the Deity. Wherefore had man his reason, if it were not to direct him? Wherefore his strength, if it be not his protection? To banish folly and luxury, correct vice and immorality, and stand immovable in the freedom in which we are free indeed, is eminently the duty of each individual, at this day. When this is done, we may rationally hope for an answer to our prayers for the whole counsel of God, and the invincible armor of the Almighty. However righteous our cause, we cannot, in this period of the world, expect a miraculous salvation. Heaven will undoubtedly assist us, if we act like men."

Quincy, like so many of his fellows, did act like a man. In his observations on the Boston Port Bill printed in 1774, he said: "Blandishments will not fascinate us, nor will threats of a 'halter' intimidate, For, under God, we are determined that, wheresoever, whensoever, or howsoever we shall be called to make our exit, we will die freemen." He died, as I have said, a freeman just after

And fired the shot heard round the world."

Patrick Henry, of Virginia, lacked that collegiate education which was an advantage to the Massachusetts orators of the Revolution. In Williamsburg, the capital of Virginia, the College of William and Mary stood at one end of Duke of Gloucester Street, and the Capitol building at the other. Henry received no culture at the college before he waxed eloquent in the Capitol; he was ill-read in the law, and ungainly in manner; but his up-country training, before he came to Williamsburg, developed that self-reliance, and integrity, and strength which lay behind his seemingly spontaneous spoken words, and made him the leader, as well as the friend, of young Jefferson. For Virginia he was Otis and Adams in one,—both orator and political manager. Not many of his burning speeches have come down to us, but we well know what he was : one of the first orators of the eighteenth century. That famous speech before the Virginia convention of 1775, of which the most famous words have already been quoted here, would alone maintain his fame. What wonder that he carried all with him when he exclaimed with utter honesty, and yet with the highest rhetorical art : “ There is no retreat but in submission and slavery. Our chains are forged. Their clanking may be heard on the plains of Boston ” ; and instantly added : “ The war is inevitable, and let it come.” Soberer, but not less effective, were such words as these : “ I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience. I know of no way of judging the future but by the past. And, judging by the past, I wish to know what there has been in the conduct of the British ministry to justify those hopes with which gentlemen have been pleased to solace themselves? Is it that insidious smile with which our petition has been lately received? Trust it not, sir ; it will prove a snare to your feet. Suffer not yourselves to be betrayed with a kiss. Ask yourselves how this gracious reception comports with those warlike preparations which cover our waters and darken our land. Are fleets and armies necessary to a work of love and reconciliation? . . . Those are the implements of war and subjugation, the last arguments to which kings resort. I ask, gentlemen, sir, what means this martial array, if its purpose be not to force us to submission."

Neither Patrick Henry, nor Josiah Quincy, nor any of the Continental leaders, was afraid of the epithet "traitor." Ten years before Henry, as above, urged Virginia to war, he had uttered his celebrated comparison, interrupted by cries of "treason" from the Speaker of the Virginia House of Burgesses: "Cæsar had his Brutus, Charles the First his Cromwell, and George the Third—may profit by their example. If this be treason, make the most of it." He who thus raised the alarm against English oppression, was not less a radical when the expediency of adopting the Federal Constitution was under consideration in the Virginia State Convention of 1788. Not a few of those who had most favored and helped to secure colonial independence, looked with concern upon the alleged danger of too strong a federal union at the expense of the rights of the States. In this fear Henry went far beyond Washington, and beyond the conservatively-democratic Jefferson. The war was over, and Henry, even more than Samuel Adams in Massachusetts, stood firmly against any new Toryism in the shape of Hamiltonian Federalism, taking the place of the confederacy that carried on the Revolution. Said he: "Even from that illustrious man who saved us by his valor, I would have a reason for his conduct; that liberty which he has given us by his valor tells me to ask this reason, and sure I am, were he here he would give us that reason; but there are other gentlemen here who can give us this information. The people gave them no power to use their name. That they exceeded their power is perfectly clear." Henry and the other extreme anti-Federalists were frightened because the preamble of the Constitution began: "We, the people of the United States," instead of "We, the States"; hence this earnest appeal against the adoption of an instrument which has veritably proved a "palladium of liberty"—in spite of disunion abolitionists, and disunion slaveholders—for a hundred years. But Henry, the honest and able, spoke in 1788 as sincerely, though not as effectively or wisely, as in 1765 or 1775. He lived to see that he had exaggerated the dangers of a central government, of which Jefferson himself was soon to be the discreet head; but he was still the great orator when, in the appeal from which the above words were taken, he said:

The public mind, as well as my own, is extremely uneasy at the proposed change of government. Give me leave to form one of the number of those who wish to be thoroughly acquainted with the reasons of this perilous and uneasy situation, and why we are brought hither to decide on this great national question. I consider myself as the servant of the people of this commonwealth, as a sentinel over their rights, liberty, and happiness. I represent their feelings when I say that they are exceedingly uneasy, being brought from that state of full security which they enjoy, to the present delusive appearance of things. Before the meeting of the late Federal convention at Philadelphia, a general peace and an universal tranquillity prevailed in this country, and the minds of our citizens were at perfect repose ; but since that period they are exceedingly uneasy and disquieted. When I wished for an appointment to this convention my mind was extremely agitated for the situation of public affairs. I consider the republic to be in extreme danger. If our situation be thus uneasy, whence has arisen this fearful jeopardy? It arises from this fatal system ; it arises from a proposal to change our government—a proposal that goes to the utter annihilation of the most solemn engagement of the States—a proposal of establishing nine States into a confederacy, to the eventual exclusion of four States. It goes to the annihilation of those solemn treaties we have formed with foreign nations . . . Those treaties bound us as thirteen States, confederated together. Yet here is a proposal to sever that confederacy. Is it possible that we shall abandon all our treaties and national engagements? And for what? . . . This proposal of altering our Federal government is of a most alarming nature : make the best of this new government—say it is composed by any thing but inspiration—you ought to be extremely cautious, watchful, jealous of your liberty ; for instead of securing your rights, you may lose them forever. If a wrong step be now made, the republic may be lost forever. If this new government will not come up to the expectation of the people, and they should be disappointed, their liberty will be lost, and tyranny must and will arise. I repeat it again, and beg, gentlemen, to consider that a wrong step, made now, will plunge us into misery, and our republic will be lost.

The “wrong step” was taken by Virginia and other States ; the Constitution was adopted, and the feeble Confederacy became the Democratic Nation. But who shall question, though Henry and Adams were better as revolutionary leaders than as constitutional statesmen, their honesty, bravery, and eloquence?

The American nation was a growth, not a creation. For its beginnings we must look back of the adoption of the Constitution, or the treaty of peace, or the Declaration of Independence, or the guns of Concord and Lexington, or the Boston Tea-Party. The germs of independence lay in the local self-government of the colonies—indeed, in the folk-motes of the Saxons. But after the Revolution had begun, a few men of conspicuous discretion and ability, of differing views, but of essentially united purpose, may fairly, though not exclusively, be entitled to the epithet, Makers of the Nation. The work of some was before, as well as after, Makers of the Nation. the constitutional period, but all had a prominent share in the work of starting and strengthening the new republic. These forceful men were Thomas Jefferson, the writer of the Declaration of Independence; Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, and James Madison, the authors of the Federalist papers; George Washington and John Adams, the first presidents of the United States; Fisher Ames; Thomas Paine; Albert Gallatin; John Marshall; and Joseph Story.

Thomas Jefferson, the first and greatest of American Democrats, in his lifetime as cordially hated by political enemies as revered by political and personal friends, now stands before us as one of the roundest and fullest characters in American history. Thomas Jefferson, 1743-1826. All things considered, none of his contemporaries, with the possible exception of John Quincy

Adams, was so well educated a man. The slender advantages proffered by the College of William and Mary he had improved to the utmost, and had supplemented them by personal investigations and by association with some of the master-minds of the colony of Virginia. Though not an orator, he was a vigorous and effective writer. It was his lot to write the most famous political document in modern history; he was a voluminous and pleasing autobiographer and letter-writer, and he produced an impartial volume of notes on Virginia. An earnest Democrat and anti-Federalist, his course after the Revolution was more discreet and helpful than that of Patrick Henry, or even Samuel Adams. He pushed scientific studies beyond their usual limits, in those days; more than any other American statesman he promoted religious toleration; and in the University of Virginia, his creation, he anticipated many of the methods of modern university work—including the elective system of studies, the investigation of Anglo-Saxon as the earliest form of English, and the bestowal of academic degrees only as a reward of successful work. If the final political test, “What did he do?” be applied to Jefferson, the result is most favorable to his renown. Assemblyman, Congressman, foreign minister, Cabinet officer, President, educator, citizen, to him more than to any other man has been due the ascendancy of the Democratic party during the larger part of the nation’s history.

When certain portions of a methodical state document pass into the honorable domain of familiar quotation, it may justly be concluded that they phrase a general truth in apt words. The English-speaking world well remembers Jefferson's plain but sonorous introduction to the Declaration :

When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation. We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal ; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights ; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed ; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

This was the new message of liberty, uttered to the world in no unmistakable phrase. In its defence the colonies could heartily say, with Jefferson's closing words in the same document : " With a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

When, just a quarter of a century later, Jefferson was called to the Presidency of the new nation, his inaugural words showed that he was fitted to apply to constitutional government the principles of a liberty broad but never designed to be communistic or leveling : " All will bear in mind this sacred principle, that though the will of the majority is in all cases to prevail, that will, to be rightful, must be reasonable ; that the minority possess their equal rights, which equal laws must protect, and to violate which would be oppression. . . . I know, indeed, that some honest men fear that a republican government cannot be strong ; that this government is not strong enough. But would the honest patriot, in the full tide of successful experiment, abandon a government which has so far kept us free and firm, on the theoretic and visionary fear, that this government, the world's best hope, may, by possibility, want energy to preserve itself ? I trust not. I believe this, on the contrary, the strongest government on earth. I believe it the only one where every man, at the call of the law, would fly to the standard of the law, and would meet invasions of the public order as his own personal concern. Sometimes it is said that man cannot be trusted with the government of himself. Can he then be trusted with the government of others ? "

This faith, this belief that in a republic, " errors of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it," has been justified—despite grave past and present dangers—in time of foreign war, of civil strife, of excited or disputed elections, and of assassinations of presidents. So, too, the United States has done well in following Jefferson's creed favoring " equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political ; peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations,—entangling alliances with none; . . . freedom of religion; freedom of the press; freedom of person under the protection of habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially selected.” It is plain that Jefferson—though, like Samuel Adams, sometimes an extremist, sometimes tricky in the achievements of his designs, and always a managing politician, was a statesman of a high rank, and one who added to the literature of statecraft.

After the Declaration came the Confederation, and after the Confederation, the Constitution. This important document was not adopted without The Constitution of the United States. long and anxious, sometimes bitter, debate. The opposition to it was not local, and was by no means restricted to those States which most earnestly espoused the “State-rights” idea. The Constitution, the work of many minds, was finally accepted, though by slender majorities in several of the States, because of the industrious efforts of many workers.

The greatest political writings connected with the adoption of the Constitution are the series of papers known as The Federalist. This series may be described as an important political variation The Federalist. of the eighteenth century type of essay. Its eighty-five papers appeared, for the most part, in The Independent Journal, a New York semi-weekly, during the last months of 1787 and the first months of 1788. The support of New York State was doubtful, so “Publius,” the writer, earnestly argued with its citizens concerning the advantages proffered by the Constitution. “Publius” was a triad, the members being

Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, and James Madison, the first two afterwards known as Federalists, the last as a Democrat. Hamilton, the Federalist leader, was the inspiring cause of these papers, of which he drew the plan, himself writing many. The general character of "The Federalist" is that of a statement of the basal principles of government, put into words easy of general comprehension, and accompanied by arguments concerning the advisability of the adoption of the Constitution under debate. Some of the statements are of universal application and lasting weight; others are ad captandum arguments addressed to prudence or even to selfishness. Not often, however, has so much political wisdom found utterance as in these essays. The Constitution having been attacked as ultra-conservative and semi-monarchical, "Publius" showed that its opponents were likely to favor the speedy dissolution of the republic. The time and purpose hardly favored the production of a calm and dispassionate treatise on government, which "The Federalist" certainly is not; but it contains, despite its lack of system, able discussions of many questions of national life and political science.

The closing words of Number XIV., printed in the New York Packet, November 30, 1787, and known to be one of Madison's contributions, illustrate the rhetorical and literary characteristics of the work at their best. This is Johnsonian English, already feeling the breath of a fresher day, and stirring with the intense purpose which pushed the Americans forward:

I submit to you, fellow-citizens, these considerations, in full confidence that the good sense which has so often marked your decisions will allow them their due weight and effect; and that you will never suffer difficulties, however formidable in appearance, or however fashionable the error on which they may be founded, to drive you into the gloomy and perilous scene into which the advocates of disunion would conduct you. Hearken not to the unnatural voice which tells you that the people of America, knit together as they are by so many cords of affection, can no longer live together as members of the same family; can no longer continue the mutual guardians of their mutual happiness; can no longer be fellow-citizens of one great, respectable, and flourishing empire. Hearken not to the voice which petulantly tells you that the form of government recommended for your adoption is a novelty in the political world; that it has never yet had a place in the theories of the wildest projectors; that it rashly attempts what it is impossible to accomplish. No, my countrymen, shut your ears against this unhallowed language. Shut your hearts against the poison which it conveys; the kindred blood which flows in the veins of American citizens, the mingled blood which they have shed in defence of their sacred rights, consecrate their union, and excite horror at the idea of their becoming aliens, rivals, enemies. And if novelties are to be shunned, believe me, the most alarming of all novelties, the most wild of all projects, the most rash of all attempts, is that of rending us in pieces, in order to preserve our liberties and promote our happiness. But why is the experiment of an extended republic to be rejected merely because it may comprise what is new? Is it not the glory of the people of America that whilst they have paid a decent regard to the opinions of former times and other nations, they have not suffered a blind veneration for antiquity, for custom, or for names, to overrule the suggestions of their own good sense, the knowledge of their own situation, and the lessons of their own experience? To this manly spirit posterity will be indebted for the possession and the world for the example of the numerous innovations displayed on the American theatre in favor of private rights and public happiness. Had no important steps been taken by the leaders of the Revolution for which a precedent could not be discovered, no government established of which an exact model did not present itself, the people of the United States might, at this moment, have been numbered among the melancholy victims of misguided councils; must at best have been laboring under the weight of some of those forms which have crushed the liberties of the rest of mankind. Happily for America, happily, we trust, for the whole human race, they pursued a new and more noble course. They accomplished a revolution which has no parallel in the annals of human society. They reared the fabrics of governments which have no model on the face of the globe. They formed the design of a great Confederacy which it is incumbent on their successors to improve and perpetuate. If their works betray imperfections, we wonder at the fewness of them. If they erred most in the structure of the Union, this was the work most difficult to be executed; this is the work which has been new modelled by the act of your Convention, and it is that act on which you are now to deliberate and decide.

This passage, perhaps the most eloquent in a series for the most part somewhat heavy in style, was written by Madison, whose contributions were undoubtedly abler than Hamilton's, or than the few papers by Jay. Madison's written words, like Burke's, have an eloquence for the reader even where they were never designed for delivery. But Madison, though afterwards elected President of the United States, was a less important figure in the days of the making of the nation than was Alexander Hamilton, the Federalist leader. Hamilton, killed by Burr in a duel at the early age of forty-seven, left literary work filling nine octavo volumes, and his personal influence was far greater than his force as a writer. Over against Jefferson, the Democrat, stood Hamilton, the Federalist. If Jefferson, unchecked, would, as his enemies alleged, have moved toward French disorganization, Hamilton doubtless would have followed ultra-conservatism with still greater readiness. He fought for the Constitution and won it, but made no secret of his longing for a stronger document and a more centralized government.

The writings of Hamilton, like those of nearly all the politicians whose names are here under consideration, had no real literary motive. They were produced in the course of the life of a statesman, and all, whether written with greater or less care, were designed to further the ends of statecraft or of political management. Some are documents illustrating the making of history; others portray the character or personality of the writers; but nothing from Hamilton's pen sought distinctly artistic results. Alexander Hamilton, as has been said, strove to secure and to establish a constitutional government much firmer than the Confederation; and he afterwards would have still further consolidated the United States under the Constitution. Therefore he wrote on governmental questions. Again, he was the Secretary of the Treasury of whom Webster said, in orotund phrase : " He smote the rock of the national resources, and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth. He touched the dead corpse of Public Credit, and it sprung upon its feet." Hence Hamilton wrote on finance, from which, by an easy step, he turned to themes affecting political economy. Of the large mass of his writings, the most significant parts are, first and foremost, his Publius letters in " The Federalist " ; besides these, his plan for a constitution ; speeches in the Federal and the New York convention ; letters, report, and opinion on a national banking system ; draft of Washington's Farewell Address ; an examination of Jefferson's Inaugural. Under the loose fashions of the time we may, perhaps, partially excuse his Farewell Address draft, or his " draft of a speech delivered by the Hon. William Smith, of South Carolina, on Commercial Relations " ; for Samuel Adams would, on occasion, write a speech for John Hancock to deliver. Not excusable, however, were his base immoralities and his contemptible defence thereof. We hardly pardon, furthermore, the undertone of diplomatic insincerity so often heard beneath his words. In his day he was deemed a brilliant orator, an effective pleader in written words, and a constitutional statesman of the highest rank. The United States of to-day is largely the result of the work of Hamilton, whom Guizot ranked " among the men who have best known the vital principles and fundamental conditions of a government worthy of its name and mission," whom Talleyrand declared unequalled among contemporary statesmen," and who, in the opinion of his latest editor, "takes his place with Turgot, Pitt, and Adam Smith as one of the leading minds of that epoch, in departments of thought which have been of unequalled importance to the interest of civilized mankind." But his rank as an author depends finally upon his contributions to "The Federalist"—a weighty and potent book, which, however, like Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations," scarcely belongs within the borderline of true literature.

George Washington, whose firmness, discretion, and conservative patriotism put the United States forever in his debt—both as regards his ^{George} _{Washington,} soldiery and his statesmanship—was a writer ^{1732-1799.} who made some small mark upon incipient American literature, and who at any rate, may be mentioned among the political writers of his time. Without collegiate education, and never paying special attention to the art of style, he wrote plainly and clearly, in a somewhat individual way. Twelve large volumes trimly include his once scattered and desultory manuscripts, chiefly letters and documents. In 1754 was printed, at Williamsburg, Virginia—then possessing the only printing press in the colony—Washington's journal of an expedition to the Ohio River. After this he wrote but when he must, and his letters, messages, and addresses simply say what they have to say, and then stop. The art of correspondence was brought to a state of some excellence in the latter half of the eighteenth century; and Washington's reputation as a letter-writer (of course aided by his official position) was such that he was obliged to make a list of spurious letters which had been credited to his pen. His chief writing, however, was that famous Farewell Address offered to his countrymen in 1796, often reprinted in a little volume or with other political matter. This address, like Washington's Inaugural in 1789, was written in Johnsonian English, with long balanced sentences and many Latin derivatives. Upon it the writer spent much pains, and he was certainly assisted by several hands in its preparation; but it so accords with his character and with his known literary style that his credit for it need not be diminished in essentials. All his great work as general and statesman—aided or shown by his minor work with the pen—proves him sincere in his piety and unswerving in his patriotism. It was much for the country, and something for literature in the days of the powerful influence of French infidelity, to be governed by a man who felt that "no people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible hand which conducts the affairs of men more than the people of the United States"; that "the propitious smiles of Heaven can never be expected on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right, which Heaven itself has ordained"; and that "the foundations of our national policy will be laid in the pure and immutable principles of private morality." *

John Adams, cousin of Samuel, vice-president under Washington, and second president of the United States, took his share in the pen-campaigns of his time. Like his son, John Quincy, he was an inveterate diarist, from 1755 to 1785, and his records of some important transactions are not only valuable as history but picturesque in language. In his correspondence, too, he preserved many perishable pictures ; here, for instance, is his historical description of the Massachusetts court, when the case of the Writs of Assistance was brought before it, a description that, by anticipation, suggests Macaulay :

The scene is the Council-chamber in the old Town-house in Boston. The date is in the month of February, 1761. The Council-chamber was as respectable an apartment as the House of Commons or the House of Lords in Great Britain, in proportion, or that in the State-house, in Philadelphia, in which the Declaration of Independence was signed in 1776. In this chamber, round a great fire, were seated five judges, with Lieutenant-governor Hutchinson at their head as chief-justice, all arrayed in their new, fresh, rich robes of scarlet English broad-cloth, in their large cambric bands and immense judicial wigs. In this chamber were seated, at a long table, all the barristers-at-law of Boston, and of the neighboring county of Middlesex, in gowns, bands, and tie-wigs. They were not seated on ivory chairs, but their dress was more solemn and more pompous than that of the Roman Senate when the Gauls broke in upon them. Two portraits, at more than full length, of King Charles the Second and King James the Second, in splendid gold frames, were hung up on the most conspicuous sides of the apartment.*

Adams could turn a phrase neatly enough, and there was matter as well as manner in his phrases.

* "J. Adams' Works," x., 244 ; also quoted in Lodge's "History of the English Colonies in America," p. 418.

To Jonathan Sewall, in 1774, he said : " The die was now cast ; I had passed the Rubicon. Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish with my country, was my unalterable determination." Webster, years later, so aptly used this expression as to make it his own, in the popular mind. Adams may also claim some small renown as a prophet, if we make an easy transfer from the second of July (when the resolution to make the Declaration of Independence was adopted) to the fourth, when the Declaration was pronounced : " The second day of July, 1776, will be the most memorable epoch in the history of America. I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary Festival. It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bon-fires, and illuminations, from one end of this continent to the other, from this time forward forevermore."

This was in a letter to Mrs. Adams, written from Philadelphia, July 3, 1776. Adams must write, but he had no literary end in view, and spent as much honest care upon a home letter as upon a state document or a newspaper article to stir the patriots. Therefore, though Adams, in Jefferson's opinion, was the best debater in Congress between 1774 and 1776 ; and though he wrote a Defence of the American Constitution, a History of the Dispute with America, an Essay on Canon and Feudal Law, etc. ; his renown as a book-maker, or master of English, is now less than that of his rival and friend, Jefferson, who died on the same day with Adams, July 4, 1826.

The early presidents of the United States, unlike some of the later ones, were men of good blood, good education, and good abilities, who wrote because they must, and who sometimes diverged into the path of pure literature. For this reason, and this only, to illustrate the superior culture of the nation's first leaders, as bearing upon the development of its literature, their names are considered here. Thus the second president of the Adams name, John Quincy Adams, "the old man eloquent," ^{John Quincy Adams,} could turn off verses of the quality of ^{1767-1848.} the sentimental poem printed below,* or of this :

* TO A BEREAVED MOTHER.

Sure to the mansions of the blessed
When infant innocence ascends,
Some angel, brighter than the rest,
The spotless spirit's flight attends.
On wings of ecstasy they rise,
Beyond where worlds material roll,
Till some fair sister of the skies
Receives the unpolluted soul.
That inextinguishable beam,
With dust united at our birth,
Sheds a more dim, discolored gleam
The more it lingers upon earth.
But when the Lord of mortal breath
Decreases his bounty to resume,
And points the silent shaft of death
Which speeds an infant to the tomb,
No passion fierce, nor low desire
Has quenched the radiance of the flame ;
Back to its God the living fire
Reverts, unclouded as it came.
Fond mourner, be that solace thine !
Let Hope her healing charm impart,
And soothe, with melodies divine,
The anguish of a mother's heart.
Oh, think ! the darlings of thy love,
Divested of this earthly clod,

This hand, to tyrants ever sworn the foe,
 For freedom only deals the deadly blow,
 Then sheathes in calm repose the vengeful blade,
 For gentle peace in freedom's hallowed shade.

This quatrain was written when the author was seventy-five ; in his earlier years, besides his poems, he had published a two-volume treatise on rhetoric (of which subject he had been professor at Harvard); a letter On the Bible and its Teachings (posthumously published) ; many biographical addresses and other minor productions ; and a minutely faithful diary, worthy of the Adams name, and surpassing in length (twelve octavo volumes), though certainly not in readableness, those of Pepys and Samuel Sewall. He showed (in his lectures on Shakespeare and elsewhere) fair critical ability, of the expository rather than the analytic kind ; and in his long humorous poem called The Wants of Man—

What first I want is daily bread
 And canvas-backs and wine, etc.

he anticipated Oliver Wendell Holmes' poem Contentment, which is virtually a copy of its prototype :

Little I ask ; my wants are few ;
 I only wish a hut of stone,
 A very plain brown stone will do, etc.

Amid unnumbered saints, above,
 Bask in the bosom of their God.
 O'er thee, with looks of love, they bend ;
 For thee the Lord of life implore ;
 And oft from sainted bliss descend
 Thy wounded spirit to restore.
 Then dry, henceforth, the bitter tear ;
 Their part and thine inverted see :
 Thou wert their guardian angel here,
 They guardian angels now to thee !

John Quincy Adams, like Washington, John Adams, Jefferson, and Madison, was a man of culture, which occasionally clothed itself in literary garb. With his successor, Andrew Jackson, the backwoods element appeared for the first time in the White House.

The national work of Fisher Ames, Thomas Paine, Albert Gallatin, John Marshall, and Joseph Story was less prominent than that of the men whose names have last been considered, and less important as indicating the intellectual bent of the United States in its early constitutional period. Ames was the chief spokesman of the New England Federalists before their decadence, and in his day his speeches were highly esteemed. His literary style is quiet, and evidently elaborated with much care.

Ames had gloomy forebodings concerning Fisher Ames, 1758-1808. the spread of French, or Jeffersonian, democracy in America ; but his intensest feelings were uttered in plain and intentionally repressed language. When, in 1796, in his greatest speech, he urged the adoption of the treaty with England, he said : " Sinking, as I am, under the sense of weakness, I imagined the very desire of speaking was extinguished by the persuasion that I had nothing to say. Yet, when I come to the moment of deciding the vote, I start back with dread from the edge of the pit into which we are plunging. In my view, even the minutes I have spent in expostulation have their value, because they protract the crisis and the short period in which alone we may resolve to escape it. . . . If the vote shall pass to reject, and a spirit should rise, as it will, with the public disorders, to make confusion worse confounded, even I, slender and almost broken as my hold upon life is, may outlive the government and constitution of my country." Thus, with half-suppressed force, all the greater for intellectual restraint, Ames pleaded for the Federalism that was first triumphant, then crushed, and after his death practically victorious, even under Democratic administrations. Ames always believed that "to be the favorite of an ignorant multitude a man must descend to their level"; and, refusing so to do, he lost some contemporary popularity, but checked certain dangerous tendencies. For literature, certainly, it was well that many leaders of thought should refuse to cater for an unenlightened popular applause.

The Swiss Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury under Jefferson and Madison, followed Hamilton in writing solidly on financial themes. Chief-

These eminent leaders of the American bench and bar showed, in their lives and books, that gracious culture upon which American literature must be founded; indeed, one of them, Story, began his career as a sentimental poet. A different mind governed the luckless Thomas Paine, whose rough but vigorous "Common Sense" pamphlet and "Crisis" periodical papers had strengthened colonial spirit in the Revolution, and whose "Rights of Man" (1792, in defence of the principles of the French Revolution) once made him an idol in France. These books are now forgotten and unread, and his deistic "Age of Reason" is popular only with the lower classes, unable to perceive its cheap and unscholarly critical method and its vulgar temper.

The later oratory of the United States was really of higher literary ability than the earlier, though it was, as a rule, less picturesque and less startling in its immediate results. What it lacked in spontaneity it made up in care of composition; the printed page often followed the author's manuscript, and was corrected by his own hand.

Twelve later American orators stand out from the great body of those who have been able to make a fluent speech. They are John Randolph, Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, John Caldwell Calhoun, Rufus Choate, Edward Everett, Robert Charles Winthrop, William Henry Seward, William Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Charles Sumner, and Abraham Lincoln. Of these, Randolph, Clay, and Calhoun were from the Southern States; Lincoln, though born in Kentucky, was really a Northern man. Choate was best known as a pleader at the bar, and Everett was most renowned on the lecture platform; the others were politicians,—indeed, Choate sat in the Senate, and Everett was a candidate for vice-president in 1860. Some of the twelve were Democrats, others Whigs, others moderate Republicans, others intense Abolitionists, others conservatively inclined, acting now with one party, now with another. In style this list includes such different orators as the classic Everett and the violent Randolph; the stately Webster and the homely Lincoln; the diplomatic Seward and the dictatorial Sumner; the cold Winthrop and the impassioned Phillips. The combined achievements of the twelve (only one of whom was living in 1885) are a credit to American literature, even when the large element of the perishable is eliminated from their speeches.

The figure of the first-named orator, John Randolph of Roanoke, was certainly sufficiently picturesque to attract attention, though, like most picturesque figures in the field of intellectual labor, he is more talked of than known. Thin, angular, and awkward in person, yellow-faced, shrill and sometimes frantic in voice, burned by an intense self-consciousness, and moved by an ambition that knew no bounds, Randolph was well fitted by nature to make a stir in his lifetime, and to leave no enduring reputation after death. His severities and eccentricities are remembered, his political acts forgotten. Without wife and children, bitter in temper, miserly in money matters, a Virginia patrician in his pride of name, keenly alive to his failures and shortcomings, at length the slave of intemperance, and all his life on the border of insanity, nothing seemed lacking to make Randolph's life miserable, as indeed it justly was. But not all the misfortunes that at length closed around him were due to his own faults, and sometimes, like a gleam of sunshine through black clouds, appeared the signs of an affectionate and honest nature.

However wretched was Randolph the man, the renown of Randolph the orator was in his lifetime high. His unquestioned courage, the cutting force of his sarcastic words, the malediction of his thin outstretched finger, made Congress listen when he spoke, and crowded the Virginia hustings wherever he appeared. The spell of his misfortunes quickened the interest in his words. "Had he been an Italian he would have passed for one possessed of the evil eye, one who brought destruction on all he loved, and every peasant would have secretly made the sign of the cross on meeting him." But whether admired or denounced, loved or hated, he was heard, and often feared, by foe and friend alike. A life-long Democrat and extreme States-rights advocate, he carried on the battle begun by Patrick Henry, prepared the way for Calhoun, and in some ways restricted the growing spirit of consolidation. Opposed to slavery on principle, he adhered to it in practice, and his sole work of any permanence was in turning the once-universal States-rights idea to the service of the "institution" of the South. In this work he helped by public invective, satire, or rambling disquisition, not by the long, patient, logically illogical methods of Calhoun. His speeches were full of gunpowder and red fire, which, once burned, left little but black spots behind them. But readers still remember how he would, with every detail of dramatic action, attack an obstructive Congressman with such an effective piece of rhetoric as this :

MR. SPEAKER,—In the Netherlands a man of small capacity, with bits of wood and leather, will in a few moments construct a toy that, with the pressure of the finger and the thumb, will cry “cuckoo! cuckoo!” With less of ingenuity and inferior materials the people of Ohio have made a toy that will, without much pressure, cry “Previous question, Mr. Speaker! Previous question, Mr. Speaker!”

Jests however bitter, or repartees however crushing, will not long support an orator's renown. Not many of Randolph's long speeches were consecutive or logical, but once in a while he could speak as in that address which his latest biographer calls his ablest. The date was January, 31, 1824, and the theme was internal improvements—then favored by the Whigs and Jeffersonian Democrats, and opposed by the extreme State-rights men. Narrow and misguided as the speech was, it yet prophesied in plain language the Nullification of 1832, the Civil War of 1861-5, the future defence of slavery behind State-rights, and the means finally taken for its overthrow :

This government cannot go on one day without a mutual understanding and deference between the State and General governments. This Government is the breath of the nostrils of the States. Gentlemen may say what they please of the preamble to the Constitution ; but this Constitution is not the work of the amalgamated population of the then existing confederacy, but the offspring of the States ; and however high we may carry our heads and strut and fret our hour, "dressed in a little brief authority," it is in the power of the States to extinguish this government at a blow. They have only to refuse to send members to the other branch of the Legislature, or to appoint electors of President and Vice-President, and the thing is done.

Randolph went on to declare contemptuously that the Government, as a government for the management of the internal concerns of this country, was one of the worst that could be conceived, and that he had "no hesitation in saying that the liberties of the colonies were safer in the custody of the British Parliament than they will be in any portion of this country, if all the powers of the States as well as of the General Government are devolved on this House." No statesman of eminence, of either party, ever made such a claim as he here attacked, but Randolph was not a man to stop when he wished to make a sensation.

On the slavery question, which was to be fought over for forty years more, he spoke thus :

There is one other power which may be exercised in case the power now contended for be conceded, to which I ask the attention of every gentleman who happens to stand in the same unfortunate predicament with myself,—of every man who has the misfortune to be and to have been born a slaveholder. If Congress possess the power to do what is proposed by this bill, they may not only enact a sedition law,—for there is precedent,—but they may emancipate every slave in the United States, and with stronger color of reason than they can exercise [sic] the power now contended for. And where will they find the power? They may follow the example of the gentlemen who have preceded me, and hook the power on to the first loop they find in the Constitution. They might take the preamble, perhaps the war-making power; or they might take a greater sweep, and say, with some gentlemen, that it is not to be found in this or that of the granted powers, but results from all of them, which is not only a dangerous but the most dangerous doctrine. Is it not demonstrable that slave labor is the dearest in the world, and that the existence of a large body of slaves is a source of danger? Suppose we are at war with a foreign power, and freedom should be offered them by Congress as an inducement to them to take a part in it; or suppose the country not at war, at every turn of this Federal machine, at every successive census, that interest will find itself governed by another and increasing power, which is bound to it neither by any common tie of interest or feeling. And if ever the time shall arrive, as assuredly it has arrived elsewhere, and in all probability may arrive here, that a coalition of knavery and fanaticism shall for any purpose be got up on this floor, I ask gentlemen who stand in the same predicament as I do to look well to what they are now doing, to the colossal power with which they are now arming this government. . . . Let them look forward to the time when such a question shall arise, and tremble with me at the thought that that question is to be decided by a majority of the votes of this House, of whom not one possesses the slightest tie of common interest or of common feeling with us.

This is quite forcible English; and, making all necessary allowances for its narrow partisanship, it was certainly a keen prophecy. Randolph clearly saw, in 1824, that the North must grow faster than the South, and that slavery would sooner or later go to the wall. He foresaw, too, that slavery might be partially abolished as a war measure (which was done in 1863), and that a Northern majority in Congress might practically force its abolition, as actually occurred when, in the process of reconstruction, States were required to adopt the emancipation amendments to the Constitution as a condition of their return to the Union.

This speech, called by Henry Adams * Randolph's masterpiece, is also said by Mr. Adams to have been "inspired by hatred of Clay." Henry Clay, the idol of the Whigs for many years, was a far more prominent figure in national politics ^{Henry Clay,} than was Randolph, who was in his ^{1777-1852.} very nature sectional and local. The bloodless duel which Clay and Randolph fought in 1826 has long been forgotten; in their struggle for political fame Clay was easily the victor. It is doubtful whether the history of American politics can show the record of a greater personal popularity than was enjoyed by Clay. A Virginian by birth, a Kentuckian by residence, a youthful admirer of Jefferson, a United States Senator at thirty years of age, Clay first reached national prominence as an advocate of the policy of internal improvements at national expense and of the protective tariff, a policy of course distasteful to the extreme States'-rights men. His transition from the Democratic party to the Whig was easily accomplished, and for the latter and longer part of his life he was, with the exception of Daniel Webster, the most prominent Whig in the country. Like Webster, he was an unsuccessful presidential aspirant, though thrice his party's candidate, and once almost elected (in 1844). Opposed to slavery, on principle, he sought its gradual extinction without extreme measures, and caused the adoption of the "Missouri Compromise," making all United States territorial lands north of 36° 30' free from slavery. As Speaker of the House of Representatives, Secretary of State (under J. Q. Adams), Senator, and publicist, he spent his lifetime in promoting conservative Whig principles. In advocating these principles he won his renown as an orator, which during his lifetime was higher than now. Less solid and less able than Webster's, his speeches were more attractive to hearers of average ability, and his personal traits were so winsome that no American, probably, ever had so large, so enthusiastic, and even so affectionate a following. His friend and follower, Horace Greeley—himself, in later years, an unsuccessful presidential candidate,—speaks of the "magic of his conversation and manners," and calls him "an admirable orator." Without this personal magic, much of the charm of his oratory is lost upon the printed page, and Clay, however honest, seems rather the rhetorician, bent upon immediate effect, than the sterling orator.

On the twenty-second of July, 1850, Clay stood in his place in the United States Senate, an old man of seventy-three, and pleaded with youthful vigor for the compromise measures of 1850—the advocacy of which, in the famous "Seventh of March Speech," cost Webster half his Northern friends. The speech shows Clay as he was—earnest, forcible, sure that he was right, bound to carry his point, but somewhat superficial and declamatory. Hear him, and note his good and bad qualities as an orator :

I am no alarmist ; nor, I thank God, at the advanced age at which His Providence has been pleased to allow me to reach [sic], am I very easily alarmed by any human event ; but I totally misread the signs of the times, if there be that state of profound peace and quiet, that absence of all just cause of apprehension of future danger to this confederacy, which appears to be entertained by some other Senators. Mr. President, all the tendencies of the times, I lament to say, are toward disquietude, if not more fatal consequences. . . . These are not only great and leading causes of just apprehension as respects the future, but all the minor circumstances of the day intimate danger ahead, whatever may be its final issue and consequence. Mr. President, I will not dwell upon other concomitant causes, all having the same tendency, and all well calculated to awaken, to arouse us—if, as I hope the fact is, we are all of us sincerely desirous of preserving this Union,—to rouse us to dangers which really exist, without underrating them upon the one hand, or magnifying them upon the other. . . . The public mind and the public heart are becoming familiarized with that most dangerous and fatal of all events—the disunion of the States. People begin to contend that this is not so bad a thing as they had supposed. Like the progress in all human affairs, as we approach danger it disappears, it diminishes in our conception, and we no longer regard it with that awful apprehension of consequences that we did before we came into contact with it. . . . Mr. President, what is an individual man? An atom, almost invisible without a magnifying glass, a mere speck upon the surface of the immense universe ; not a second in time, compared to immeasurable, never-beginning, and never-ending eternity ; a drop of water in the great deep, which evaporates and is borne off by the winds : a grain of sand, which is soon gathered to the dust from whence it sprang. Shall a being so small, so petty, so fleeting, so evanescent, oppose itself to the onward march of a great nation, which is to subsist for ages and ages to come ; oppose itself to that long line of posterity which, issuing from our loins, will endure during the existence of the world ? Forbid it, God. Let us look to our country and our cause, elevate ourselves to the dignity of pure and disinterested patriots, and save our country from all impending dangers.

Then, after some utterances of never, never, etc., Mr. Clay went on to ask, if nothing be done toward tranquillity, whether all the monarchs of the Old World would not “ pronounce our glorious Republic a disgraceful failure ” ; and next proceeded to make this touching appeal, worthy of Chadband himself :

And, sir, when you come into the bosom of your family, when you come to converse with the partner of your fortunes, of your happiness, and of your sorrows, and, when in the midst of the common offspring of both of you, she asks you : “ Is there any danger of civil war ? Is there any danger of the torch being applied to any portion of the country ? Have you settled the questions which you have been so long discussing and deliberating upon at Washington ? Is all peace and all quiet ? ” what response, Mr. President, can you make to that wife of your choice and those children with whom you have been blessed by God ? Will you go home and leave all in disorder and confusion—all unsettled—all open ?

Abler and loftier were Mr. Clay’s closing words :

If Kentucky to-morrow unfurls the banner of resistance unjustly, I never will fight under that banner. I owe a paramount allegiance to the whole Union—a subordinate one to my own State. When my State is right—when it has a cause for resistance—when tyranny, and wrong, and oppression insufferable arise, I will then share her fortunes; but if she summons me to the battle-field, or to support her in any cause which is unjust against the Union, never, never will I engage with her in such cause.

A printed speech cannot reproduce the original effect; and it is hard to judge justly of an orator's fame by means of extracts like these. But the careful student of Clay's speeches must come to the conclusion to which these selections lead: that Clay was an honest, patriotic, and able politician, but not a great orator. His speeches are too often tawdry and inelegant; their cheap finery makes their bad English all the more apparent. What is worse, the underlying thought is too often neither profound nor valuable. If we contrast Clay's best speeches with those of other Whig leaders of the century, such as Webster in America or (mutatis mutandis) Gladstone in England, their poverty becomes painfully apparent.

Upon the exterior of the Sanders Theatre of Harvard University—the oratorical centre of the oldest American college—are seven sculptured heads of the greatest orators of the world, who, according to this selection, are Demosthenes the Greek, Cicero the Roman, St. Chrysostom the Syrian, Bossuet the Frenchman, Chatham and Burke the Englishmen, and Daniel Webster the American. The choice is a fit one. Whatever the claims of other leading American orators, Webster, all, is their chief. So he was regarded during his lifetime, and the years since his death have not diminished his renown. Indeed, now that Webster's intense ambitions and bitter disappointments have long been quenched in ashes, the solidity of his renown as an orator has become more apparent.

Webster was a New Hampshire lad of the sturdy New England stock, who went in due course to Dartmouth College, made the most of his advantages, and became a notable figure, even in his student days. The defects of an imperfect preparation for college he partially repaired by his industry while an undergraduate. In those subjects which he liked, he was singularly well-equipped; and though his early achievements were somewhat irregular, and, like so many men of genius, he neglected those branches for which he had small taste, he was really a young man of high promise before his twentieth year. His instructors recognized his abilities, which they deemed higher than those of any other student they had ever taught; and in the year 1800, when Webster was a Junior in college, and but eighteen years of age, he was requested by the townspeople of Hanover to deliver an oration on the Fourth of July.

In this Fourth of July speech the young Webster
Webster's Life-Work. fairly outlined what was to be his life-work. He lauded the makers of the new nation, spoke of its promise, predicted its great future, urged devotion to the idea of one country, and declared the Constitution to be the precious pledge of the perpetuity of the Union, a thing ever to be sought and maintained. Webster, in the ensuing half century of his life, was not an ardent Abolitionist, like Sumner, nor a zealous defender of slavery and States' rights, like Calhoun. He failed to win the coveted prize of the Presidency, nor was his name connected with many potent Congressional measures. At one time he bent toward the selfish slave-oligarchy of the South, and at another he was subservient to the money-kings of State Street, Boston. But he was first, last, and always the defender of the Union, at a time when constitutional consolidation was not yet complete, and when the principles of nullification and secession had begun their work. That the United States maintained its union ; that the final settlement of the slavery question was so long postponed by conservative measures, while the power of the anti-slavery North steadily grew ; and that the civil war of 1861-5 (years after Webster's death) resulted in a Union victory, was due to the long, patient work of Daniel Webster more than to that of any other American statesman.

The literary historian need not recount Webster's early successes at the bar ; his triumph in winning the " Dartmouth College Case " (involving the question of legislative interference with chartered rights) before the Supreme Court ; his services as member of the House of Representatives, senator, and Secretary of State ; and his disappointments in the Whig presidential nominating conventions, which set him aside for " available " military men not possessing a tithe of his ability. He held high offices, and was for years the most commanding figure in the Senate of the United States ; he was twice at the head of the Cabinet, and he was in the hearts of his countrymen "my brave senator,"—as Emerson wrote to Carlyle in 1839. Thousands of Americans, like young Emerson, followed his "great forehead from court-house to senate-chamber, from caucus to street." All this was more than the fleeting popular tribute paid to Clay; it was the recognition of an intellect of the first order. The more thoughtful knew, indeed,—to borrow Emerson's phrase once more,—that he was "no saint," but "a prodigal"; yet they recognized that behind that massive figure, that commanding port, those piercing eyes, there dwelt a mind which well deserved its fame. Webster is a speech-maker whose high renown has survived his popularity in life, his trimming and time-serving traits; his occasional willingness to speak on subjects of which he was profoundly ignorant, and his personal sins. His enduring greatness as an orator is manifest now to him who reads his noble volumes of speeches.

Webster's manner was deliberately adopted,— Webster's method. indeed, it was the only manner consistent with his nature and tastes. It was orotund, imposing, profound, weighty, sometimes heavy. But in this manner he had no superior among the orators of his century. Words which from a feeble man would have seemed platitudes, in his mouth, and in his carefully-pondered phrase, became familiar quotations, watchwords of liberty, rallying cries of party. "Let our object be our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country,"—uttered by him in 1825, in his address at the laying of the corner-stone of Bunker-Hill Monument, Charlestown,—became familiar from east to west. This triplicate form was a favorite with Webster, and reappears in some of his other famous dicta: "The people's government, made for the people, made by the people, and answerable to the people"; "One country, one constitution, one destiny"; "I was born an American; I live an American; I die an American." If but a narrow space separates these words from the commonplace, the chasm of separation is very deep; their success was no accident. Webster's capacious memory saved up allusions which he might need in future, coined phrases, and polished and elaborated them until the moment of utterance, when he deserved the success he almost always won. There is sometimes in his speeches an apparent lack of spontaneity, and ready wit was not to be looked for in his words. His English style was not that of Johnson, nor yet that of Gladstone, but belongs between the two. It cannot be called a Latinized style, through and through, yet Latin derivatives bore an important part in securing its sonorousness, and resonance, and power. The antithesis, too, Webster used freely, but never just as it was used by the orators or the "classic poets" of the eighteenth century in England, or (more briefly but more constantly) by Macaulay in Webster's own day. He was certainly, as one of his critics claims, "a master of English style"; and, indeed, his strength and his influence are shown in the fact that an adjective has been coined from his name, and is in familiar use. Just as we say "Addisonian," "Johnsonian," "Wordsworthian," "Emersonian," we say "Websterian," and our meaning is everywhere understood. It is hard to dis sever the thought of the man himself from the study of his writings ; but Websterian, even in literature, denotes the possession of qualities solid, substantial, imposing.

The greatest speeches delivered by Daniel Webster—they are too familiar to need citation—were those on the Dartmouth College Case (United States Supreme Court, March 10, 1818) ; on the character of the first settlers of New England (Plymouth, Massachusetts, December 22, 1820) ; at the laying of the corner-stone of Bunker-Hill Monument (Charlestown, Massachusetts, June 17, 1825) ; at the completion of the same (June 17, 1843) ; on the characters of Presidents Adams and Jefferson (commemorative exercises in Faneuil Hall, Boston, August 2, 1826) ; on States' rights versus the nation (in reply to Senator Hayne of South Carolina, January 26 and 27, 1830) ; on the character of Washington (February 22, 1832) ; on Jackson's veto of the National Bank Bill (July 11, 1832) ; on the Plymouth Pilgrims (at New York, December 22, 1843) ; on the religious instruction of the young (in the Girard will case, Supreme Court, February 20, 1844) ; and on "The Constitution and the Union" (the famous "seventh of March" compromise speech, 1850). To these should be added one of the most celebrated pleas in an American criminal case—Webster's arraignment of the accused in the White murder trial at Salem, Massachusetts. These are but a small part of Webster's legal, political, and commemorative speeches ; but one cannot read them through without assigning to their writer the first place in the American forum. He was, as has been said, sometimes grandiose, pompous, fonder of "great swelling words" than of common-sense; but his sincerity, gravity, massiveness, and strength, set forth with the aid of patient but hidden art, as a rule far outweigh the orator's manifest faults, and give him a place of his own. We need not declare Webster an American Burke or Chatham; it is enough to call him, for the world, Webster.

The chief opponent of Webster in the Senate of the United States, was John Caldwell Calhoun, of South Carolina. Webster was John Caldwell Calhoun, 1782-1850. not an extremist; he represented, to be sure, the Whig ideas of a strong central government, protection to American industries, and a temperate restraint of the growth of slavery; but he did not push any Whig or sectional theory to an extreme point. Calhoun, on the other hand, was extreme in almost all political theories and in many public acts. Webster's unswerving devotion, in public life, was to the nation, Calhoun's to the single State of South Carolina. Webster loved the whole Union, Calhoun cared but for his own section. Webster was willing to make sacrifices for the benefit of the whole country, Calhoun would have sacrificed the rights of distant States for the good of the South. Yet Calhoun, from his mistaken point of view, was as loyal to the idea of Right as was Webster; his private character was higher, and his public career less open to charges of selfish ambition. In ability he was undoubtedly inferior to the great Massachusetts statesman, but among all the politicians and orators of the Southern States he was easily the leader. In him was incarnated the complete theory of States' rights,—a theory originally held without reference to local aims and circumstances, but finally turned by Randolph and Calhoun to the implicit service of negro slavery. It was Calhoun's misfortune that he fought his life-fight for an institution in its nature temporary, alien to the spirit of modern civilization, justice, and Christianity, and doomed both by the race-constituents and the geographical contour of the United States. He battled bravely, honorably, and long in a losing cause, and though he died at a moment when victory seemed achieved—with Webster himself as an ally,—the apparent triumph of States'-rights Democracy was fleeting. Upon the United States of to-day the influence of Calhoun is almost nil, while the Websterian idea never was stronger. The progress of events has banished the very shade of the great Nullifier, and outside his own State few read his once-famous speeches, even for curiosity's sake.

But their merits are apparent at a glance. In the Calhoun as an orator. first place, candor, courage, and loyalty to an ideal appear in almost every line, and these form the soul of a body of style which displays many rhetorical beauties. Calhoun was more than conservative, he was reactionary; but in his reactionary speeches, looking backward as they did toward mere colonialism, he defended colonialism in a masterly way. To him the republic was virtually no republic at all, merely the temporary agent of the sovereign States, retaining its powers so long as it did the work of the single States employing it. He served his own State as Webster did the nation, and gave her whatever powers of logic or eloquence he possessed. "The Constitution has admitted the jurisdiction of the United States within the limits of the several States only so far as the delegated powers authorize; beyond that they [the "forcing-acts" of 1832] are intruders, and may rightfully be expelled; and that they have been efficiently expelled by the legislation of the State through her civil process, as has been acknowledged on all sides in the debate, is only a confirmation of the truth of the doctrine for which the majority in Carolina have contended." Thus he spoke in the Senate in 1833, in defence of South Carolina's "nullification" of United States laws displeasing to her. What could be clearer, what more neatly put? "The very point at issue between the two parties there, is, whether nullification is a peaceful and an efficient remedy against an unconstitutional act of the General Government. . . . We were not children, to act by halves. Yet for acting thus efficiently the State is denounced, and this bill reported, to overrule, by military force, the civil tribunal and civil process of the State! . . . The State stands pledged to resist no process of the [supreme] court. Why, then, confer on the President the extensive and unlimited powers provided in this bill? Why authorize him to use military force to arrest the civil process of the State? But one answer can be given: That, in a contest between the State and the General Government, if the resistance be limited on both sides to the civil process, the State, by its inherent sovereignty, standing upon its reserved powers, will prove too powerful in such a controversy, and must triumph over the Federal Government, sustained by its delegated and limited authority; and in this answer we have an acknowledgement of the truth of those great principles for which the State has so firmly and nobly contended." This battle for "inherent sovereignty" Calhoun fought to the end of his life; nullification was crushed by President Jackson in 1832, and secession by the Northern armies in the war of 1861-5; the theory of extreme States' rights and a dissoluble Union has been slain by the sword; but even now we cannot spare our applause for the speaker's eloquent and logically consistent words, as they echo through half a century from that dim period which to the American is sufficiently described by the words "before the war":

Notwithstanding all that has been said, I may say that Calhoun's neither the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Clay-life-argument. ton], nor any other who has spoken on the same side, has directly and fairly met the great question at issue: Is this a Federal Union? a union of States, as distinct from that of individuals? Is the sovereignty in the several States, or in the American people in the aggregate? The very language which we are compelled to use when speaking of our political institutions, affords proof conclusive as to its real character. The terms union, federal, united, all imply a combination of sovereignties, a confederation of States. They never apply to an association of individuals. Who ever heard of the United State of New York, of Massachusetts, or Virginia? Who ever heard the term federal or union applied to the aggregation of individuals into one community? Nor is the other point less clear—that the sovereignty is in the several States, and that our system is a union of twenty-four sovereign powers, under a constitutional compact, and not of a divided sovereignty between the States severally and the United States. In spite of all that has been said, I maintain that sovereignty is in its nature indivisible. It is the supreme power in a State, and we might just as well speak of half a square, or half a triangle, as of half a sovereignty. It is a gross error to confound the exercise of sovereign powers with sovereignty itself, or the delegation of such powers with the surrender of them. A sovereign may delegate his powers to be exercised by as many agents as he may think proper, under such conditions and with such limitations as he may impose; but to surrender any portion of his sovereignty to another is to annihilate the whole. The Senator from Delaware calls this metaphysical reasoning, which he says he cannot comprehend. If by metaphysics he means that scholastic refinement which makes distinctions without difference, no one can hold it in more utter contempt than I do; but if, on the contrary, he means the power of analysis and combination—that power which reduces the most complex idea into its elements, which traces causes to their first principle, and, by the power of generalization and combination, unites the whole in one harmonious system,—then, so far from deserving contempt, it is the highest attribute of the human mind. It is the power which raises man above the brute—which distinguishes his faculties from mere sagacity, which he holds in common with inferior animals. It is this power which has raised the astronomer from being a mere gazer at the stars to the high intellectual eminence of a Newton or a Laplace, and astronomy itself from a mere observation of insulated facts into that noble science which displays to our admiration the system of the universe. And shall this high power of the mind, which has effected such wonders when directed to the laws which control the material world, be forever prohibited, under a senseless cry of metaphysics, from being applied to the high purposes of political science and legislation? I hold them to be subject to laws as fixed as matter itself, and to be as fit a subject for the application of the highest intellectual power. Denunciation may, indeed, fall upon the philosophical inquirer into these first principles, as it did upon Galileo and Bacon, when they first unfolded the great discoveries which have immortalized their names; but the time will come when truth will prevail in spite of prejudice and denunciation, and when politics will be considered as much a science as astronomy and chemistry.

Thus Calhoun fought in defence of a theory inconsistent with any idea of a stable or permanent government. No one pretends that the States gave up all their powers to the general government. Again, it is an indisputable fact, verified by all history, that when a state, a combination of states, a colony, a section, a city, feels that it has the right and the might to overthrow a government, it may do so if it can, by peaceable or by warlike measures. Thus Maximus threw off the Roman yoke in Britain, thus the colonies rebelled against Britain in America. But to assert that the States of the American Union simply delegated their powers to a general agent whose acts were subject to approval or disapproval, to adoption or rejection, by a single State, was preposterous—a theory which was not consistent with the Constitution, nor with the simplest governmental act of legislation. On Calhoun's plan, the United States government had no right to levy a tax of one cent in South Carolina, unless the State sanctioned the tax. Nullification was simply this refusal; the tariffs of 1828 and 1832 being declared "null, void, and no law, nor binding upon South Carolina." Not even a good literary form can long make interesting such arguments as Calhoun's. To him the United States were a confederation; he could not have said that the United States was a nation; and he always spelled State with a capital letter. History has passed by him and his plea, and now deems his words "null, void, and no law."

The prominence of Massachusetts in American oratory during the nineteenth century is apparent at a glance. It is to be explained by two causes: the existence in New England of the English Puritan stock, and the prevalence of the higher education. These causes, wherever or whenever existing elsewhere in the United States, with the spread of intelligence and education, have produced similar, though perhaps not equal, results. Indeed, Massachusetts at the present day can show no such array of speakers as Webster, Choate, Everett, Winthrop, Phillips, and Sumner, who were contemporaries.

Rufus Choate, like Webster, was a graduate of Dartmouth; became, as did Webster, a Boston lawyer, and, having been elected a Congressman in 1832, was chosen United States Senator in 1841, to succeed Webster, when the latter was appointed

Rufus Choate, 1799-1859. Secretary of State under President Harrison. The names of Webster and Choate are affectionately associated in the college of their graduation, and in the State whose reputation they enhanced. But, though both were great orators, their abilities and successes differed widely. Webster was preëminently a statesman, Choate a lawyer;

Webster's triumphs were won in commemorative discourses or public debates ; Choate's, for the most part, in pleas before juries. If Webster was the first of American orators, Choate was clearly the first of American lawyers. His abilities were no less apparent in intellectual analysis of cases than in the eloquence of his pleas at the bar. It necessarily follows that the reputation of a great lawyer, like that of an eminent actor, and even more than that of other orators, must be largely traditionary. Cases fade from thought, juries and counsel disappear, and public interest wanes. Choate's power over juries, his fervid eloquence, his ability to make the driest subjects fascinating, must to a great extent be taken on the testimony of our elders. But the force and grace of his printed speeches are apparent : in particular, of his tribute to " The Eloquence of Revolutionary Periods " (Feb. 19, 1857) ; of his eulogy on Daniel Webster (before the faculty and students of Dartmouth, July 27, 1853) ; of " American Nationality " (the Boston Fourth of July oration, 1858). In these, his masterpieces, the style is too florid and sometimes intricate. The sentences are somewhat soaring and pretentious, and the manner often melodramatic. We miss the intense fire of the speaker's personality, as the illumination of his dramatic action. Choate lived in an age of sentiment, and his language is that of perpetual eulogy, unchastened by the critical spirit. But if he was influenced by his time, he also influenced it. If persuasion is the ultimate mark of rhetorical success, within the fields of his effort he seldom failed to win that success.

His ways and methods have been somewhat changed in cold and intellectual New England, though followed in other parts of the country. But enthusiasm cannot ultimately give way to cold criticism, though sentiment fade before high idealism. The spirit of Choate still wins us, if his mannerisms have lost their power to charm. And when he spoke under the deepest feeling, in the most inspiring surroundings, and after patient artistic labor, his words displayed such prose-poetry as glows in the peroration of his eulogy of Webster :

It is time that this eulogy was spoken. My heart goes back into the coffin there with him, and I would pause. I went—it is a day or two since—alone, to see again the home which he so dearly loved, the chamber where he died, the grave in which they laid him—all habited as when till the heavens be no more. Throughout that spacious and calm scene all things to the eye showed at first unchanged. The books in the library, the portraits, the table at which he wrote, the scientific culture of the land, the course of agricultural occupation, the coming-in of harvests, fruit of the seed his own hand had scattered, the animals and implements of husbandry, the trees planted by him in lines, in copses, in orchards, by thousands, the seat under the noble elm on which he used to sit to feel the southwest wind at evening, or hear the breathings of the sea, or the not less audible music of the starry heavens, all seemed at first unchanged. The sun of a bright day, from which, however, something of the fervors of mid-summer were wanting, fell temperately on them all, filled the air on all sides with the utterances of life, and gleamed on the long line of ocean. Some of those whom on earth he loved best, still were there. The great mind still seemed to preside, the great presence to be with you; you might expect to hear again the rich and playful tones of the voice of the old hospitality. Yet a moment more, and all the scene took on the aspect of one great monument, inscribed with his name, and sacred to his memory. And such it shall be in all the future of America! The sensation of desolateness, and loneliness, and darkness, with which you see it now, will pass away; the sharp grief of love and friendship will become soothed; men will repair thither as they are wont to commemorate the great days of history; the same glance shall take in, and the same emotions shall greet and bless the Harbor of the Pilgrims, and the Tomb of Webster.

His look drew audience still as night,
Or summer's noontide air,

Choate's style was his own—beautiful rather in its shifting pictures than in any finished artistic whole. Infelicities abound, but when such sympathetic words as these were illuminated by his flashing eye, were given new and fuller meaning by the intonations of his voice, and were emphasized by his telling gestures, we can well believe that his audience was bound in a spell.

Edward Everett, another of the orators who made Boston, in the middle of the nineteenth century, seem almost a new Academy, possessed neither massive strength nor intense fire. He was, in truth, an academic orator; bearing many marks of similarity to John Quincy Adams. He was in early manhood a Harvard professor, was minister of the Brattle Street Church, Boston, at twenty, wrote poetry and religious tracts, prepared a Greek grammar, familiarized himself with Europe and European celebrities, edited The North American

Review, and in 1824 won oratorical renown by a careful college address on "The Circumstances Favorable to the Progress of Literature in America." No Massachusetts orator was ever equipped for his work by an education so complete. To the knowledge acquired by study he added the fruits of official experience, as Representative in Congress, United States Senator, Minister to England, Secretary of State, Governor of Massachusetts, and President of Harvard College. For the last-named office his tastes did not fit him, but his success in political life was marked—especially in his diplomatic labors. In 1860 Everett was nominated for Vice-President of the United States, on the Constitutional Union ticket; that he failed of election was perhaps a national misfortune.

The American orator has inevitably treated such themes as have been suggested by historical anniversaries, philanthropic or political gatherings, or the death of great men. In orations on such topics the American tendency toward wholesome optimism has of course found more room for development than has the caustic temper of a Randolph of Roanoke. Mr. Everett was a pleasant, winsome speaker, whose chief error was that, too often, he only praised or expounded, when he might have added blame to his commendations and analyses. He was not a great creator, not an irresistible destroyer. But his temper was not always uncritical; his long, smooth, well-balanced sentences sometimes presented both sides of a subject; and he could, as in his defence of America against her half-informed critics, fifty years ago, cut and sting. His most-repeated lecture, that on Washington, displayed at the best his strong yet gentle powers, his elaborate but genuine rhetorical art. In Everett was well displayed that sound conservatism upon which the nation and its literature has so confidently relied.

On the nineteenth day of November, 1863, was dedicated, in the presence of a large and distinguished Everett and company, the national cemetery on the Lincoln at Gettysburg. battle-field of Gettysburg, the turning-point of the civil war. By a natural choice, Everett was selected to deliver the principal oration, as being the most eminent living orator in the United States. His speech was in his most felicitous style, and well represented the oratorical school to which he belonged. The language was choice, the classical allusions were apt, the modern descriptions were poetic yet just, and the spirit, though saddened, was hopeful for the future of the nation. Everett's words were those of the American orator of the middle period,—after the Revolution and the making of the nation, and before the new time of freedom from conventional rules. On the same day President Lincoln delivered his famous Gettysburg address. The contrast between these two well-known funeral orations could not have been more marked. Everett's was long, Lincoln's short; Everett's drew allusions from classic history, Lincoln's went no farther back than the record of American nationality; Everett's displayed the culture of the Boston university man and the European resident; Lincoln's was the plain speech of an unlettered native of Kentucky and citizen of Illinois. The range and ultimate direction of American literature—to which both orations clearly belong—could not have been better illustrated than by their variant methods and similar results.

“Standing beneath this serene sky,” began Everett, “overlooking these broad fields now reposing from the labors of the waning year, the mighty Alleghanies dimly towering before us, the graves of our brethren beneath our feet, it is with hesitation that I raise my poor voice to break the eloquent silence of God and nature. But the duty to which you have called me must be performed; grant me, I pray you, your indulgence and your sympathy.” Then followed, in limpid language, an account of the Athenian rites in memory of those who had died in their country’s cause; then Everett exclaimed—in words whose oratorical finish is almost unexcelled:

Shall I, fellow-citizens, who, after an interval of twenty-three centuries, a youthful pilgrim from the world unknown to ancient Greece, have wandered over that illustrious plain, ready to put off the shoes from my feet as one that stands on holy ground,—who have gazed with respectful emotion on the mound which still protects the dust of those who rolled back the tide of Persian invasion, and rescued the land of popular liberty, of letters, and of arts, from the ruthless foe,—stand unmoved over the graves of our dear brethren, who so lately, on three of those all-important days which decide a nation’s history,—days on whose issue it depended whether this august republican Union, founded by some of the wisest statesmen that ever lived, cemented with the blood of some of the purest patriots that ever died, should perish or endure, —rolled back the tide of an invasion, not less unprovoked, not less ruthless, than that which came to plant the dark banner of Asiatic despotism and slavery on the free soil of Greece? Heaven forbid! And could I prove so insensible to every prompting of patriotic duty and affection, not only would you, fellow-citizens, gathered many of you from distant States, who have come to take part in these pious offices of gratitude—you, respected fathers, brethren, matrons, sisters, who surround me—cry out for shame; but the forms of brave and patriotic men who fill these honored graves would heave with indignation beneath the sod.

So moved on Mr. Everett's language, in narration, congratulation, patriotic appeal, and enthusiastic peroration; an elegant example of classical rhetoric, as applied to the necessities of a modern theme. That speech and that day may be deemed the bounds of the earlier period of American oratory. Our speech-makers before the war were, at their best, profound, graceful, finished, inspiring; at their worst they were empty, orotund, bombastic, uncritical, putting sound before sense, and America before the philosophy of history. At their front were several true orators, but there lagged behind a great army of Fourth-of-July speakers and members for Buncombe County. The newer rhetoricians were simply to "speak right on," without studied art or much rhetorical device. It is too soon, as yet, to compare the two schools; certainly Boston has now no such contemporaries as she could boast a generation ago. There are, however, manifest advantages in that simple method illustrated by President Lincoln's Gettysburg address, which the newer school of orators may well make a model for imitation:

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in Liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Lincoln's

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle-field of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field, as a final resting-place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.*

* "I have seen the wisest statesman and most pregnant speaker of our generation,—a man of humble birth and ungainly manners, of little culture beyond what his own genius supplied—become more absolute in power than any monarch of modern times, through the reverence of his countrymen for his honesty, his wisdom, his sincerity, his faith in God and man, and the noble, humane simplicity of his character. And I remember another, whom popular respect enveloped as with a halo,—the least vulgar of men, the most austere genial, and the most independent of opinion. Wherever he went, he never met a stranger, but everywhere neighbors and friends, proud of him as their ornament and decoration. Institutions which could bear and breed such men as Lincoln and Emerson, have surely some energy for good."—JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

The oratory of Robert C. Winthrop, who outlived all his associates in the Boston rhetorical school, resembles that of Everett in many points. With all their differences, these Boston orators were much alike, in political conservatism, in debt to classical culture, in grace and beauty of style, and in a certain verbosity and pedantry—or at least an over-fondness for classical allusions. Winthrop, a descendant of Governor John Winthrop, and his filial biographer, was a law-student in the office of Daniel Webster, became a “Webster Whig,” and afterward, like many of similar mind, united with the Democratic party.* A State legislator, a Representative in Congress, Speaker of the House, and United States Senator, his career closely followed the lines of the other orators of Massachusetts, who have been mentioned here. Like them, he interested himself in many historical, scientific, and art movements, and delivered addresses over corner-stones, beside new statues, or at anniversary gatherings. America is fond of commemorative occasions, and is determined to make good, in some degree, its lack of venerable historical monuments. As Choate and Everett paid the honors of eulogistic tribute to the memory of Webster, so Winthrop delivered the appropriate commemorative discourse after the death of his friend Everett. If this school as a whole lacked critical insight and fearless discrimination between the good and the bad elements in the subjects of discourse, it must be remembered that it is not easy to speak in condemnation of a great man lately departed; and that the modern fashion of denouncing a dead Carlyle as "a brute and a boor," or a dead Longfellow as "the poet of the commonplace," had not been invented in the days of the great Boston orators.

It was Winthrop's rare good fortune to deliver the oration on the laying of the corner-stone of the Washington monument (July 4, 1848), and also to write (though, because of illness, he could not deliver) the oration at its dedication (Feb. 21, 1885). His closing words—those of an old man trained in the schools of the former day—caught the spirit of the newer time, and warned the men of the modern republic not to lose the enthusiasm and self-sacrifice of their forefathers :

A celebrated philosopher of antiquity, who was nearly contemporary with Christ, but who could have known nothing of what was going on in Judæa, and who, alas! did not always "reck his own rede"—wrote thus to a younger friend, as a precept for worthy life: "Some good man must be singled out and kept ever before our eyes, that we may live as if he were looking on, and do every thing as if he could see it."

Let me borrow the spirit, if not the exact letter, of that precept, and address it to the young men of my country: "Keep ever in your mind, and before your mind's eye, the loftiest standard of character. You have it, I need not say, supremely and unapproachably, in Him who spake as never man spake, and lived as never man lived, and who died for the sins of the world. That character stands apart and alone. But of merely mortal man the monument we have dedicated to-day points out the one for all Americans to study, to imitate, and, as far as may be, to emulate. Keep his example and his character ever before your eyes and in your hearts. Live and act as if he were seeing and judging your personal conduct and your public career. Strive to approximate that lofty standard, and measure your integrity and your patriotism by your nearness to it, or your departure from it. The prime meridian of universal longitude, on sea or land, may be at Greenwich, or at Paris, or where you will. But the prime meridian of pure, disinterested, patriotic, exalted human character will be marked forever by yonder Washington obelisk!"

Yes, to the young men of America, under God, it remains, as they rise up from generation to generation, to shape the destinies of their country's future—and woe unto them if, regardless of the great example which is set before them, they prove unfaithful to the tremendous responsibilities which rest upon them!

Yet let me not seem, even for a moment, to throw off upon the children the rightful share of those responsibilities which belongs to their fathers. Upon us, upon us, it devolves to provide that the advancing generations shall be able to comprehend and equal to meet the demands which are thus before them. It is ours—it is yours especially, Senators and Representatives, to supply them with the means of that universal education which is the crying want of our land, and without which any intelligent and successful free government is impossible. . . .

The inspiration of the centennial anniversary of that first great inauguration must not be lost upon us. Would that any words of mine could help us all, old and young, to resolve that the principles and character and example of Washington, as he came forward to take the oaths of office on that day, shall once more be recognized and revered as the model for all who succeed him, and that his disinterested purity and patriotism shall be the supreme test and standard of American statesmanship! That standard can never be taken away from us. The most elaborate and durable monuments may perish. But neither the forces of nature, nor any fiendish crime of man, can ever mar or mutilate a great example of public or private virtue.

Our matchless obelisk stands proudly before us to-day, and we hail it with the exultation of a united and glorious nation. It may or may not be proof against the cavils of critics, but nothing of human construction is against the casualties of time. The storms of winter must blow and beat upon it. The action of the elements must soil and discolor it. The lightnings of heaven may scar and blacken it. An earthquake may shake its foundations. Some mighty tornado, or resistless cyclone, may rend its massive blocks asunder and hurl huge fragments to the ground. But the character which it commemorates and illustrates is secure. It will remain unchanged and unchangeable in all its consummate purity and splendor, and will more and more command the homage of succeeding ages in all regions of the earth.

God be praised, that character is ours forever.

Elsewhere in the country were many orators of no small ability. The chief of those outside New England, in the period just before, and including, the war, was William H. Seward, of New York. Born in the year of Webster's graduation from college, he died just before the reëlection of U. S. Grant to the presidency. His career thus bridged the earlier and later times in American political history. Though a college graduate, his education was less complete than that of his Massachusetts peers, and his political work less closely connected with literary forms and successes. All his life a Whig or Republican leader in New York or national politics, he was in 1860 an unsuccessful presidential aspirant. According to the just testimony of his friend and eulogist, Charles Francis Adams, Mr. Seward did more than any man to break down in New York, the self-seeking, office-hunting, "ring" political system of Aaron Burr at one time and Martin Van Buren at another. "The difference between Seward and Burr or Van Buren is the difference between Sir Isaac Newton and a gamester—the clear perception of great results drawn from abstract philosophical deductions, and the sharp calculation of chances applied to the management of dice." Seward, as Governor of New York, Senator, and Secretary of state during the civil war, was a patriot and a conservative. He saved his country from sad disaster by yielding to the just demands of England in the Mason and Slidell affair in 1861. His diplomatic caution, aided by personal integrity and a knowledge of the philosophy of history, give value to his speeches, and especially to his (posthumously published) "Diplomatic History of the Civil War in America." This work, with its many documents by Mr. Seward, illustrates his mental, political, and literary powers. Not externally brilliant, they were of solid worth, and secured for the United States diplomatic triumphs as great and as essential as those of Gettysburg and Appomattox.

Randolph and Calhoun were intense, uncompromising defenders of States' -rights and slavery. Clay, Conservative Opponents of Slavery. Webster, Choate, Everett, and Winthrop were conservative opponents of slave-extension, devoted to the North, but still more to the Union, and not advocating or promoting any extreme or individual theory. They wished, by any or all just means, to secure the greatest good to the greatest number, to restrain fanaticism in all sections of the country, to continue and strengthen the stability of the republic. Their work was therefore general rather than particular. They spoke on patriotic anniversary occasions; they restated and enforced the principles laid down by the founders of the nation, whose names and work they eulogized; they argued for measures of compromise; they restrained as well as urged on. This general political method was aided by their broad, old-fashioned rhetorical habits, and by their disinclination for sharp, incisive criticism. But another school quite matched the "fire-eaters" of the South, in vigor and in unswerving devotion to a single purpose. These were the Abolitionists. Their numbers were comparatively small, but in zeal they made up for what they lacked in physical strength. Some of them were men of high social position, academic education, and genius, like James Russell Lowell; others lacked all these advantages. Not a few wished to abolish other things than slavery—for instance, the "orthodox" creed, the use of meat, existing marriage laws, the prevalent labor system. But, with all their eccentricities—which, in the case of John Brown, amounted to the promoting and justification of midnight murders, whereby the laws of the land and of Christianity were set aside for a "higher law" and an alleged special inspiration—they were desperately in earnest. Whatever might be said of their means, whether or not they were wholly in the right, the thing they opposed was clearly and terribly wrong. By their actions they hastened the collapse, in "fateful lightning" and by the "terrible swift sword," of the system of slavery, which would have waned, in longer time, before slower and milder, but inevitable, opposition.

Without mentioning the many who fought long and loyally in the abolition cause, and without discussing the work of those who were connected with politics, or journalism, or philanthropy, rather than with the literature of oratory, one should here name four great Abolitionists: William Lloyd Garrison,

William
Lloyd Garrison,

Wendell Phillips, Charles Sumner, and Abraham Lincoln. Garrison's work was done with his pen as much as with his voice, though he was well known as an orator. In youth he printed an obscure volume of poems (published by Oliver Johnson, another Abolitionist); he was a voluminous letter-writer, and he contributed much to the several periodicals he edited, of which The Liberator was the most famous and the most influential. His written words were a power by reason of the personal force and intense convictions that urged them forth. He wrote not to make literature, but, like the Puritans, to apply an ethical principle. To this every thing in Garrison's life was bent. "I will be heard," said he, in the first number of The Liberator; and he was heard. He went too fast and too far; he included in his vituperation the Christian religion and the Constitution of the United States. Indeed, he favored the dissolution of the Union, if by this means alone slavery could be abolished, or cut off from relations with the North. The churches were, for the most part, pro-slavery or silent, and the Constitution was certainly not an anti-slavery document, therefore Garrison disliked both. His own personal religion inculcated non-resistance, and the doctrine called "perfectionism," "complete holiness," or "sanctification," but these not in the usual evangelical sense. Like Thoreau, he felt himself outside or above existing governments, which he practically criticised, and was ready, theoretically, to destroy, when he thought them wrong. Toward those who, hating slavery and desiring its abolition, differed with him concerning the means of its extirpation, he was sometimes bitter and domineering. For gradual emancipation and schemes of colonization he had a hearty contempt, and would not always treat their advocates with patience. His courage, and his extreme position, made him for years the acknowledged leader of the anti-slavery cause. A reward for his arrest and conviction was offered by the Legislature of one Southern State, and his name was familiar, North and South, for thirty years before the war. His few books and many editorials and speeches are not extant in a collected form, and his work was an influence rather than a creation. But as an influence it was very powerful. Mr. Garrison showed his inherent dignity and greatness by retiring from public life at the close of the war, when slavery was abolished by constitutional amendment. At the same time (the close of 1865) the publication of The Liberator was discontinued. By means which Garrison could hardly have anticipated, but which his noble and self-sacrificing work furthered, in the midst of poverty, obloquy, and personal violence, was accomplished that triumph celebrated by his friend Whittier in his "Laus Deo" poem, closing :

How they pale,
 Ancient myth and song and tale,
 In this wonder of our days,
 When the cruel rod of war
 Blossoms white with righteous law,
 And the wrath of man is praise !

Blotted out !
 All within and all about
 Shall a fresher life begin ;
 Freer breathe the universe
 As it rolls its heavy curse
 On the dead and buried sin !

It is done !
 In the circuit of the sun
 Shall the sound thereof go forth.
 It shall bid the sad rejoice,
 It shall give the dumb a voice,
 It shall belt with joy the earth !

Ring and swing,
 Bells of joy ! On morning's wing
 Sound the song of praise abroad !
 With a sound of broken chains
 Tell the nations that he reigns,
 Who alone is Lord and God !

Wendell Phillips was not less interested than Garrison in the emancipation of the slave, and the chief efforts of his life were directed toward that end. But he was by nature and by art an orator, even more than a reformer. To speak was his life-work. As Horace Greeley said,

Wendell Phillips,

Phillips made men think it was easy to be an orator. He did not put the form before the spirit ; he was no mere rhetorician, hunting for a cause whereon to display his eloquence ; but he would have spoken gracefully and strongly upon any question which aroused his interest. So, indeed, he did. His intellectual equipment, and, to a certain extent, his tastes, were academic ; like Sumner, he was fond of classical themes and allusions, and when occasion demanded, he could take pleasure in mere external finish. Well-read in ancient and modern literature, a master in the use of invective and epigram, possessed of wit, which both Garrison and Sumner lacked, he charmed the cultivated and impressed the ignorant. A winsome personal presence, and a serene, undisturbed manner, added to the attractiveness of his words, and enabled him to speak before great audiences of enemies. As courageous as Garrison, he refused to honor a Clay or a Webster even after their death. "We do not play politics," said he, in 1853 : "anti-slavery is no half-jest with us ; it is a terrible earnest, with life or death, worse than life or death, on the issue." "No amount of eloquence, no sheen of official position, no loud grief of partisan friends, would ever lead us to ask monuments or walk in fine processions for pirates ; and the sectarian zeal or selfish ambition which gives up, deliberately and in full knowledge of the facts, three million of helpless human beings to hopeless ignorance, daily robbery, systematic prostitution, and murder, which the law is neither able nor undertakes to prevent or avenge, is more monstrous, in our eyes, than the love of gold which takes a score of lives with merciful quickness on the high seas." "To have elaborated for the nation the only plan of redemption, pointed out the only exodus from this 'sea of troubles,' is much. This we claim to have done in our motto of IMMEDIATE, UNCONDITIONAL EMANCIPATION ON THE SOIL."

A man with these convictions, fortified by personal courage, by self-sacrifice, by freedom from ambition for wealth or office, and by the literary and personal arts of the true orator, could not fail to be a power in the land. Besides this great work, he promoted temperance and woman's rights, and took pleasure in such side-triumphs as that won in the lecture the public liked so well, on "The Lost Arts." But when slavery was abolished Phillips' occupation was gone. Lacking the self-restraint of Garrison, and the philosophical mind of Sumner, he did not retire from public life, but continued to speak, advocating the cause of Ireland, or of a perpetual greenback currency, or of the "rights of labor" as interpreted by demagogues who used his abilities to further their own purposes. After the great battle of anti-slavery had been fought and won, Phillips' strong blows were struck into the air.

Sumner, agreeing with the abolition principles of Garrison, Phillips, Whittier, Lowell, and the advanced New England school, was enabled to apply those principles in public life, and to the legislative acts of Congress. Elected to the senate in 1851, by a coalition of "Free-Soilers" and Democrats, he remained a member of that body until his death. The cruel and long-injurious assaults made upon his person in 1856, in the senate-chamber, by Brooks, a pro-slavery Representative from South Carolina, made Sumner more than ever a central figure in the anti-slavery movement. Like Garrison in the Boston mob of 1835, he had suffered physical martyrdom in the cause. But his speeches, elaborate, logical, clear, and eloquent, needed no adventitious aid to fasten them in the public mind. Twelve compact volumes contain his chief speeches in Congress and elsewhere. They are virtually a history of the anti-slavery movement, in and out of Congress, and of the legislation which secured to the freed negroes their civil rights. Sumner was the parliamentary leader of the Abolitionists, and his speeches, in fulness, method, and aptness of treatment, form the most valuable literary memorial of their work. Lacking the quick fire of Garrison's or Phillips' words, their lofty scorn of wrong, their intense enthusiasm, and their loyal devotion to the "genius of universal emancipation" make them seem, even now, like words from the heights. Sumner's speeches mirror the character of the man: ever devoted to principle, free from sordid aim or mercenary ambition, intolerant of subterfuge or disloyal compromise, eager to lay at the feet of freedom the spoils of learning and of time. There was, however, another side to Sumner's character: he was proud, selfish, discourteous to his adversaries, intensely aggravating in personal vituperation, sure of his own infallibility, and, save toward his intimate friends, utterly lacking in tact. Emerson's words on tact were, in reality, sadly applicable to his friend Sumner :

“ What boots it, thy virtue,
 What profit thy parts,
 While one thing thou lackest,—
 The art of all arts ? ”

Again, he lacked those important equipments of a great orator : wit, and the power to see and to make visible all sides of a subject. His speeches, even the great argument for peace, called “ The True Grandeur of Nations,” sometimes seem heavy and dull, save when he spoke in anger. But his words would last in the literature of oratory, if only because, with all their faults, they expressed and vindicated the right of free speech at a time when too many were timid.

The last of the Abolitionists—the one to whom it fell to write the Proclamation of Emancipation—was Abraham Lincoln. Lacking a collegiate education, taught by his own efforts, Lincoln made good use of such opportunities for reading as he had possessed. He, “ a plain blunt man,” could say : “ I only speak right on ” ; but some of his later speeches are models of terse and forcible expression, and undoubtedly deserve mention here. His Gettysburg address has been already quoted ; it, and his second inaugural address, March 4, 1865, are pearls of American literature. Re-read the mighty sentences—worthy of a Hebrew prophet—with which the inaugural closes :

The Almighty has his own purposes. Woe unto the world because of offences, for it must needs be that offences come, but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh. If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of those offences which, in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through His appointed time, He now wills to remove, and that He gives to both North and South this terrible war as the woe due to those by whom the offence came, shall we discern there any departure from those Divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to Him? Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondsman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said, that the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphans, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and a lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

Elsewhere in this volume are discussed the conditions which failed to promote the cultivation and spread of literature in the South. The power of politics in the social and intellectual life of that section produced—especially in the first fifty years of the country's history—great statesmen, the names of several of whom have been considered in this chapter. Much of the later oratory of the South, represented by such men as Robert Y. Hayne (Webster's opponent in the great Union debate), William C. Preston, John J. Crittenden, John C.

Breckinridge, Thomas L. Clingman, and Robert Toombs, is no longer studied or esteemed, save, perhaps, in the States where they lived. The "South" is slowly giving up its provincialism, taking its place in the general literary work of the country, and becoming willing to measure its great men and its small by just canons of comparative criticism. Its "past at least is secure," but so is its future, if it act wisely. The downfall of its caste- and manorial-system, with the spread of education, will supply it with orators enough.

Two names belonging to the bygone South deserve brief mention at the close of this chronicle of American political literature. By an interesting coincidence, Jefferson Davis, the only president, and Alexander H. Stephens, the only vice-president, of the "Confederate States of America," made large and full records of the times, all of which they saw, and a great part of which they were. Mr. Davis' "Rise and Fall of the Confederate States of America" cannot claim very high literary rank. If it is readable, it is so on account of the important events described, and of the relations of the writer to those events; and not because of any inherent attractiveness or excellence of style. Furthermore, it cannot be praised for the historical quality of judicial impartiality, which it assuredly does not possess. It would perhaps have been too much to expect that Mr. Davis, with his well-known temper of mind, could show any special fairness toward his victorious opponents at the North. But his treatment of those whom he disliked, in the military and civil councils of the Confederacy itself, is neither serene nor generous. The work, however, is an important historical treasury, which, in its relations to its producer, can hardly be ignored by the literary student. After all, merely artistic canons do not determine the fame, influence, and place of all printed books; and a literary-political chronicle of America should not ignore the personal records produced by the head of the greatest "lost cause" in American history.

Other reasons, and stronger ones, turn the reader's attention to the important work of Mr. Stephens. His history of the war between the States is by far the most important historical treatise produced in the South itself on this theme. Nowhere else are the nature, growth, and application of the States'-rights theory so well reviewed as in these able, candid, and full chapters. When the final war-history shall be written from the great available mass of material, the author will probably find these two volumes of more service, as an original authority, than the useful histories by Horace Greeley, Benson J. Lossing, or John William Draper, on the Northern side; or E. A. Pollard, on the Southern. The many books with reference to the lives and labors of abolitionists, "fire-eaters," Union-lovers, war statesmen, military campaigners, and private soldiers will, in due time, leave their quintessence in the library of pure literature.

CHAPTER VII.

WASHINGTON IRVING.

WASHINGTON IRVING was the author who first gave American literature a place in the European ^{Washington} mind. Readers in England and on the ^{Irving,} Continent had heard an occasional faint ^{1783-1859.} echo of American theological controversies; a few students of philosophy had taken the trouble to read Jonathan Edwards; many had followed the course of transatlantic oratory and political writing; and Benjamin Franklin had been received by scholars, scientists, and diplomatists as their peer, perhaps their superior. But before Irving no American writer had been read as a representative of literature, pure and simple. Irving wrote books, not theological treatises, political arguments, speeches, or scientific papers; and these books were accepted by English readers at even more than their real value. Their writer possessed the qualities which well fitted him to be a literary pioneer. He was loyal to the soil and traditions of his own country, yet quick to assimilate the customs and characteristics of other lands; he first made distinctly American themes familiar to the world of letters, and he, also, in England and Spain, collected romantic treasures which had escaped the eye of earlier narrators. He was influenced by a humor and pathos which were genuine, and he was deeply read in the eighteenth-century writers of England—particularly the essayists—whose style he was able to absorb or reproduce in such a way as to continue the literary traditions of preceding years. His range was wide; covering essay, fiction, history, biography, travel; now he was tenderly pathetic, now broadly humorous. His external English style was fairly entitled to be called Addisonian, and he easily surpassed Charles Lamb in evenness of execution. Behind all that he did, appeared his own serene, happy, and well-balanced character. If we do not carry the parallel too far, we may characterize him as the George Washington of American literature.

For these reasons Irving was long deemed the first American writer, in merit as well as in time. The renown of Hawthorne or Emerson in later years overshadowed his own; and the severer critics found in Irving's stories fancy rather than imagination. It may justly be said that as a romantic historian Irving must yield to Prescott; of the philosophy of history he had little idea; and his full life of Washington and his charming biography of Goldsmith are not literature of the first class. Even in his justly-praised style there is an element of artificiality and of attitudinizing graciousness, which annoys the nineteenth-century reader, and which is hardly a mark of the large literary manner. Washington Irving is not the greatest American author, but he was a man who did our literature a noteworthy service, whose pioneer work was admirable, and whose high renown, in his lifetime and since, was deserved. Why criticise one great writer because he has not the qualities of another? or why attempt to assign him a precise numerical rank?

Does an author create his literary surroundings, at least in part, and shape his own career, or is he created by those surroundings, and shaped by circumstance, time, and environment? Neither theory can be followed to the extreme; but of Irving it may be said that he was moulded by his birth and situation, and also formed in large measure the literary conditions which he shared. Of British parentage (his father Scotch and his mother English), he was born in New York in the year of the treaty of peace between England and the United States, after the Revolution. The first conspicuous American author was neither a Puritan nor a Southron; the local tone of his American writings is that of New York City and the Hudson. His religious element, so far as it exists, is that of placid, old-fashioned Episcopacy, undisturbed by "modern thought" or any special idea of progress. The American elements of vigor, push, independence, high creative ambition, are lacking in Irving the author, as they were lacking in Irving the man. In literature and in life he was the genial conservative. Washington "blessed" his namesake in New York, when Irving was a baby; and the Washingtonian courtesy and contented reserve always characterized Irving, without the dogged and self-reliant persistency of the first President.

Irving's education was obtained neither at Harvard nor Yale ; and his parents did not choose to send him, perhaps against his will, to Columbia, the college of his brothers,—then, as now, virtually an advanced school for New Yorkers only. He was a great reader, and duly went to school, but the culture he afterward showed so conspicuously in his writings was self-acquired—as indeed all culture must be. He early began to scribble, both in prose and verse ; literary precocity was then common ; but his first writings were less meritorious than those of Bryant and Longfellow, both of whom were brilliant boys. Irving, like Bryant and Longfellow, thought to study law, but the unwise intention was soon abandoned. Peter Irving, his brother, was the editor of the New York Morning Chronicle, to which, in 1802, Washington contributed letters over the signature of Jonathan Oldstyle. Those were the days of newspaper pseudonymous essays ; these letters by Irving were of a class familiar in London for seventy-five years. They satirized town faults and foibles, spoke a good word for manliness of character, and discussed the theatrical condition and ephemera in general. They have not been preserved in the complete editions of Irving, and merely showed his “ bent,” which was clearly to be that of an eighteenth-century essayist, with such wider range of labor as newer times made necessary. A sickly and apparently consumptive youth, Irving walked much in the open air, thereby developing his local patriotism, and his familiarity with New York and the Hudson region. These pedestrian tours failed to restore his health, and at twenty-one he was sent to Europe. His tour was like that which so many English university men had been accustomed to take, ever since the days of Chaucer. France was first visited, then Italy. He was an observer rather than a student, but he was already beginning to profit by literary society and conversation with men of culture. Before he left America he had met Charles Brockden Brown, the earliest American novelist; and in Rome he walked and talked with Washington Allston, one of the earliest American painters, also, in after years, a poet and novelist. Young Irving, quitting Rome, and abandoning a whimsical idea of becoming a painter like Allston, next went to Paris, the Netherlands, and London, thence again home.

The European wanderings of a young man—even of a young author—are too common to concern the literary historian. But in Irving's case the "grand tour" was an important thing. That new creature, the American author, was getting his education; the crude Westerner was becoming a citizen of the world. To see Mrs. Siddons and Kemble; to talk with the greatest of talkers, Madame de Staël; to tread the pavement of Westminster Abbey or St. Peter's; to gaze on Vesuvius and the Coliseum,—all this was a new experience for an American, and to Irving was a great benefit. Nowadays, our Europe is everywhere; then it had to be visited if one would assimilate any part of it. He had not, as yet, visited that Spain of which he was to become so ardent an admirer in after years; but he had got breadth of mind and a culture which, though not academic, was perhaps better for Irving than any thing the meagre course at Harvard, Columbia, or Princeton could have given. Meanwhile, best of all, health had come again, and with his new bodily and mental equipment Irving finally abandoned the law and set out as a man of letters. Opportunities were few, but New York offered more, perhaps, than any other city; and the young writer had friends in the newspaper and magazine offices, who could at least give him a start.

Irving was born in the eighteenth century, before the great romantic revival in England; and he was well read in the English essay, as well Literary Style. as in the novelists of the period of 1750, and in the classic poets of the school of Pope. He felt the force of the romantic movement, in due time, and shared it, in his search for foreign and picturesque themes in history and fiction; but after all, his training and tastes were of the old-fashioned, well-regulated, academic order. The Addisonian type has not won a conspicuous place in American literature, but Irving, so far as he was Addisonian, achieved a distinguished success. Brockden Brown introduced the weird, the romantic, the appalling, the "native American," and made a failure, on the whole; Irving, using the English manner for his treatment of American themes, made one of those happy compromises to which pioneers sometimes owe their success. Incautiousness may retard a reform, as truly as timid conservatism; Irving wrote like an Englishman, and thus pleased the English and also his countrymen, as yet timid and colonial in literary matters ; but he portrayed the Knickerbocker Dutchmen, the scenery and characteristics of the city of New York, the beauties and poetic capabilities of the Hudson, the folk-lore and humanity of the land of Rip van Winkle and Katrina van Tassel, the vastness of the half-explored New West, the character and career of the first American President. Those English critics are wide of the mark who declare that Irving was merely an English gentleman and author who spent a part of his time at Sunnyside on the Hudson, and occasionally wrote on American themes. Irving was characteristically American, and was the first of our writers to show Americans and Englishmen that good literature could spring from native soil. On the other hand, Irving saw plainly that he could not lose sight of the old models nor break with transatlantic traditions, and that he must devote a good share of his writings, in their various divisions, to subjects taken from English history, literature, or social life ; to the romances of Spain ; or to the records of the world's past.

The little paper called Salmagundi, written by Washington and William Irving and James Kirke Paulding, was simply Addison's ghost, transferred to Knickerbocker's New York. New York and transformed into a censor of Knickerbocker society. Its Launcelot Langstaff, William Wizard, and Anthony Evergreen, its essays on the men and things of the day, and its occasional sharp thrusts of wit, made their little shivery sensations in provincial New York, and were duly and promptly forgotten. Much more successful, and much more deserving of success, was that elaborate burlesque, "Knickerbocker's History of New York," which Irving at first designed to be a mere parody of Samuel L. Mitchill's pretentious "Picture of New York," a book then newly issued. Peter Irving worked with his brother on the skit at first, but soon was obliged to sail for England. Washington thereupon changed the plan of his humorous history, making it a pseudo-veracious Knickerbocker-Dutch chronicle, and publishing it at length, accompanied by the ancient but never quite stale device of a statement concerning the mysterious disappearance of a half-insane antiquarian, the discovery of a manuscript, etc. The more stolid New-Yorkers were galled by this transparent fraud, and a few of them, even after they had been informed of the joke, and had read the book, were hotly angry at the irreverence shown their ancestors. Meanwhile the rest of the world read, laughed, and praised.

In December, 1809, therefore, the United States had a book of its own, a work in the genuine field of belles-lettres, original in scene, plot, anecdote, and character, and possessed of sound literary merit. Nothing so good, of its kind, had previously been written by an American; and, indeed, a Swift or a De Foe, if living in New York at the time, need not have been ashamed of its authorship. A satire, it was based on truth, as all good satires must be; its central figure, the Dutchman in New Amsterdam, was a creation; its incidents were well managed; and in it was achieved that hard-won triumph, the spinning of a joke through three or four hundred duodecimo pages. It was occasionally coarse, but Fielding, it should be remembered, had not long been dead; its strokes were sometimes too broad and deep for refinement, but at least it won the notice it sought. Scott praised it across the water, and the American public was stimulated by it to reading habits. Its very frankness and breeziness were emancipators. Irving had made a strong start as a literary man, and America had a modest classic, indigena terræ.

The "Knickerbocker school" is a convenient term (though no more accurate than the expression "Lake poets") by which Washington Irving, his friend James Kirke Paulding, and the poets Joseph Rodman Drake and Fitz-Greene Halleck are grouped together. Irving wrote "Knickerbocker's New York"; all four were New-Yorkers by residence, and represented Knickerbocker traditions in some degree; and to the long-lived Knickerbocker Magazine some of them contributed. Together they aided materially in the formation in New York of a literary coterie or loosely connected school, which it much needed in the early years of the century.

After the appearance of "Knickerbocker's History," Irving dabbled in magazine editorship and in business, his brothers Peter and Ebenezer having started a commercial enterprise in Liverpool, whither he went. Both these employments failed to support him, and he returned to literature. Much English and Scotch society was open to him on this British tour; he met Scott, Campbell, Jeffrey, the publisher Murray, and other men of books, and broadened his knowledge and his reputation. Business had failed ; father, mother, and loved one were dead ; and Irving, at thirty-five, temporarily quit his native land and set out in the literary life in London. The work with which he began his career was the best that ever came from his pen, one of the ten or twelve choicest books produced by an American : " The Sketch-Book." In accordance with a fashion then prevailing, its American publication was in numbers ; but in England, after some business delays, the work was produced by the great Murray in two volumes. Here, as before, the powerful Scott praised Irving, and several editors, Whig and Tory, —Lockhart in Blackwood, Jeffrey in the Edinburgh, and others—gave it a hearty welcome.

A book had been published, after many difficulties ; praise had come from kind friends, and favorable criticism from strangers ;—what does this very old story signify? Not much, ordinarily, but in this instance one notes that, even more than in the case of " Knickerbocker's History," English critics were actually commending an American book. Best of all, they were praising its grace of style, its depth of pathos, its masterly quality. To make Byron weep was not a great achievement (a story tells us that he wept over " The Broken Heart"), for in that increasingly sentimental age everybody wept on slight provocation ; but it was a great thing to show that an American book could have solid value, even when not written upon a religious, political, or grotesque theme. As the years have gone by, the position of this American classic—it may fairly be called one of our classics—remains secure. The new American-Dutch vein of “The Legend of Sleepy Hollow” and “Rip van Winkle”; the pleasant descriptions of English country life in “The Country Church,” the “Christmas Sketches,” “Rural Life in England,” and “Rural Funerals”; the quiet pathos of “The Broken Heart” and “The Pride of the Village”; the humorous musings on the “Mutability of Literature” and the “Art of Book-Making”; and the gaily moving story called “The Spectre Bridegroom,”—all these, and others almost as well known, were a real addition to literature. The Westminster Abbey essay is quite equal to that on the same theme in “The Spectator.” All through the collection are marks of an over-nicety of manner, an unwillingness to “speak out,” that in time becomes tiresome; but artificial finish had not been too common in our literature before Irving. If there is sentimentality, as well as sentiment, in such passages as this, which I quote as a sample of many, there are in it, also, a heart of truth and a form of beauty. “Feeling,” and feeling expressed in flowing language, was a mark of the literature of the time; certainly in Irving it appears at its best:

Ay, go to the grave of buried love, and meditate! There settle the account with thy conscience for every past benefit unrequited, for every past endearment unregarded, of that departed being who can never—never—never return to be soothed by thy contrition!

If thou art a child, and hast ever added a sorrow to the soul, or a furrow to the silvered brow of an affectionate parent—if thou art a husband, and hast ever caused the fond bosom that ventured its whole happiness in thy arms to doubt one moment of thy kindness or thy truth—if thou art a friend, and hast ever wronged, in thought, or word, or deed, the spirit that generously confided in thee—if thou art a lover, and hast ever given one unmerited pang to that true heart which now lies cold and still beneath thy feet ; then be sure that every unkind look, every ungracious word, every ungentle action, will come thronging back upon thy memory, and knocking dolefully at thy soul—then be sure that thou wilt lie down sorrowing and repentant on the grave, and utter the unheard groan, and pour the unavailing tear—more deep, more bitter, because unheard and unavailing.

Then weave thy chaplet of flowers, and strew the beauties of nature about the grave ; console thy broken spirit, if thou canst, with these tender yet futile tributes of regret ; but take warning by the bitterness of this thy contrite affliction over the dead, and henceforth be more faithful and affectionate in the discharge of thy duties to the living.

One more extract (from the essay called “ English Writers on America ”) may be made from “ The Sketch-Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent.,” Irving on National Prejudices. to illustrate Irving’s discreet and strong position at a time of bitterness and misunderstanding between England and America. It was his course, as outlined in these words, that helped to win him a high reputation in both countries, and to emancipate American literature from a merely colonial state :

What have we to do with national prejudices? They are the inveterate diseases of old countries, contracted in rude and ignorant ages, when nations knew but little of each other, and looked beyond their own boundaries with distrust and hostility. We, on the contrary, have sprung into national existence in an enlightened and philosophic age, when the different parts of the habitable world, and the various branches of the human family, have been indefatigably studied and made known to each other; and we forego the advantages of our birth, if we do not shake off the national prejudices as we would the local superstitions of the old world.

But above all, let us not be influenced by any angry feelings, so far as to shut our eyes to the perception of what is really excellent and amiable in the English character. We are a young people, necessarily an imitative one, and must take our examples and models, in a great degree, from the existing nations of Europe. There is no country more worthy of our study than England. The spirit of her constitution is most analogous to ours. The manners of her people—their intellectual activity—their freedom of opinion—their habits of thinking on those subjects which concern the dearest interests and most sacred charities of private life, are all congenial to the American character; and, in fact, are all intrinsically excellent; for it is in the moral feeling of the people that the deep foundations of British prosperity are laid; and however the superstructure may be time-worn, or overrun by abuses, there must be something solid in the basis, admirable in the materials, and stable in the structure of an edifice that so long has towered unshaken amidst the tempests of the world.

Let it be the pride of our writers, therefore, discarding all feelings of irritation, and disdaining to retaliate the illiberality of British authors, to speak of the English nation without prejudice, and with determined candor. While they rebuke the indiscriminating bigotry with which some of our countrymen admire and imitate every thing English, merely because it is English, let them frankly point out what is really worthy of approbation. We may thus place England before us as a perpetual volume of reference, wherein are recorded sound deductions from ages of experience ; and while we avoid the errors and absurdities which may have crept into the page, we may draw thence golden maxims of practical wisdom, wherewith to strengthen and to embellish our national character.

Irving was now a popular author, and received for his new books those large payments which were in vogue in London at the beginning of the century. “Bracebridge Hall” appeared in the spring of 1822—virtually a continuation of what may be called the Merry England chapters in “The Sketch-Book.” As a genial chronicle of upper-class English life and character, nothing better could be asked for. Irving’s mannerism had now become inveterate, but it was a mannerism in which well-balanced sentences, genuine humor, faithful descriptions, and hearty morality always had a place. His refinement of style was sometimes excessive, and his readers never completely lose sight of the rhetorician manipulating the printed words.

After a foolish and not very remunerative period of hack dramatic writing with that third-rate play-wright, John Howard Payne, Irving brought out his “Tales of a Traveller,” a work with the finish of “Bracebridge Hall,” and with more spirit and spontaneity, such as fiction should have, as compared with sketches. As a story-teller, Irving stands high in the second class, in our literature ; his tales, at their best, are readable, original, and artistic, though they seldom burn and glow, and master the reader, making him feel the presence of genius. Detailed consideration of Irving’s place in fiction must be postponed to another volume of this work—that on American poets and novelists.

~ In 1826 began the preparation of an important division of Irving's work—that devoted to Spanish subjects. As has been said, Irving was not possessed of first-class powers in historical writing; as an analyst he was not at his best, and dry search for philosophical principles in history was certainly distasteful to him. But his fondness for romance, his descriptive powers, and his ability to make out-of-the-way subjects attractive, aided him in the half trustworthy records of the Goths, the Spaniards, and the Arab-Moors on the Iberian peninsula. Some of his Spanish stories pleasantly remind the reader of the characteristics of the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments"; while his "Life and Voyages of Columbus," which appeared in 1828, did more than any preceding book to interest American readers in historical subjects. The romantic American-Spanish theme was congenial to Irving, the narrative was vigorously carried forward, and the literary style was worthy of the author of "The Sketch-Book." Irving's residence in Madrid, between 1826 and 1829, was of great importance in the development of his mature mind, and in the progress of his literary career. "How full of interest," he exclaimed, "everything is, connected with the old times in Spain! I am more and more delighted with the old literature of the country, its chronicles, plays, and romances. It has the wild vigor and luxuriance of the forests of my native country, which, however, savage and entangled, are more captivating to my imagination than the finest parks and cultivated woodlands." The reasons for Irving's success in his lives of “Columbus and his Companions,” his “Conquest of Granada,” and his “Legends of the Conquest of Spain,” are contained in this graceful sentence. With all his conventionality, with all his debt to classic English writers, Irving never forgot that he was an American, and that the new American literature deserved, and should have, his heartiest support. The charming stories comprised in the “Alhambra” volume, not less than the Hudson legends, show his fertility of thought, his originality of invention, and his romantic tendency. Spain, as well as New Amsterdam, lived again in his pages. The “Life of Columbus” proved anew that a foreign writer may produce a better history or biography than a native. Ticknor, Prescott, and Motley but re-emphasized this truth, which Irving, first among American authors, made apparent.

By 1830, Irving had also brought out a chronicle of the “Conquest of Granada,” and had been appointed Secretary of Legation at London. Literary Success. Irving’s literary position was now commanding, and high honors followed. Oxford made him a Doctor of Civil Law; the Royal Society of Literature bestowed upon him a medal; at home, the North American Review was almost extravagant in his praise. Even in money matters his success was worthy of mention; Murray had paid him three thousand guineas for the “Columbus,” and two thousand for the “Granada,” which, however, proved unremunerative to the publisher. The “Voyages of the Companions of Columbus,”—a sort of anticlimax to “The Voyages of Columbus—naturally brought but five hundred guineas, and thence forward, though he received a thousand guineas for the "Alhambra," Irving hardly belonged to the highly-paid coterie. In 1832 he returned to America, which he had not for an instant ceased to call his home, though he had been absent more than half a generation. He was welcomed with honor, and indeed with enthusiasm.

The quality of Irving's work for the next seventeen years was inferior to that of the books which he had previously produced. He had scarcely returned, and become settled in his old State of New York, when he undertook what was at that time an elaborate American journey. Timothy Dwight, half a century before, had devoted no less than four volumes to his "Travels in New England and New York"; Irving pushed his explorations much further westward, visiting Missouri, Arkansas, and New Orleans. The record of this journey was called "A Tour on the Prairies,"—which, though not lacking in picturesque descriptions, does not show the art of Irving's European chronicles, and has shared the usual fate of books of travel. This was issued as the first volume of the "Crayon Miscellanies"; the second was devoted to "Abbotsford and Newstead Abbey," and the third to "Legends of Spain,"—describing the downfall of Roderick the Goth, and the Moorish conquest. The three volumes were issued in Philadelphia in 1835. Another work of travel appeared in the same city the next year with the title of "Astoria." John Jacob Astor, the founder of the Astor fortunes, wanted some one to "write up" his Astoria colony on the Columbia River, in Oregon, and asked Irving to do so. Irving politely suggested that his nephew, Pierre M. Irving, might prepare the materials, and that he himself would retouch them and give the benefit of his name. The two worked together at a country house of Mr. Astor, near New York; they were well paid; and they duly manufactured two volumes which pleased Mr. Astor and won some critical praise. But on the whole they lowered the author's reputation. Literary work for a patron, done to order, is fortunately uncommon in the United States. At Mr. Astor's house Irving met Captain Bonneville, U. S. A., who had had a romantic career on the Western border. Purchasing Bonneville's materials, and making them into shape, the author of "The Sketch-Book" appeared in 1837 as the author of "The Adventures of Captain Bonneville"—a subject more suitable for Cooper than for himself. In 1841 his good nature led him to prepare a memoir of Margaret Miller Davidson, a deceased poet of the "infant phenomenon" order. After this, new editions of "Rip Van Winkle" and "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow" appeared, and Irving edited "The Book of the Hudson." All this literary work was not contemptible, but it certainly was not commanding. Irving was living on his past renown.

Meanwhile, however, Irving had generously resigned to the historian Prescott a plan for a history of the Spanish conquest of Mexico, and this generous courtesy was deemed to come from the man who stood at the very forefront of American literature. Hawthorne's fame and Emerson's were as yet undeveloped, and Longfellow's highest achievements were still unwrought. Irving's best writing was, with two exceptions, all in existence, and it was widely popular. The United States felt that he had done the nation a service which could never—and need never—be repeated. Personal, literary, and even civic honors were heaped upon him; he declined a nomination for the mayoralty of New York, and the secretaryship of the navy under Van Buren. He accepted, however, an appointment as Minister to Spain under the same administration from which Poe vainly sought some little office. During the necessary European tour Irving renewed old acquaintances among the world's famous people, and made new ones, but his absence had little literary result. His four years at Madrid were busied with diplomatic duties, in the troublous times when Queen Isabella was a child in the hands of regents.

The closing years of Irving's life were marked by renewed and loftier literary productiveness. In 1849 appeared his "Life of Oliver Goldsmith," based upon a sketch he had prepared some years before, but now rounded into completion. It is one of the best biographies in the whole range of English literature, just, full, brilliant. It forms a counterpart to Irving's Biographies. Boswell's "Johnson"; no one whose idea of Goldsmith has been formed by Boswell can afford to neglect Irving's presentation of the Irish poet and novelist. In spirit and style this small book is worthy to stand on the shelf with its author's choicest works. Larger and more ambitious in every way, but really less praiseworthy, is that two-volume life of "Mahomet and his Successors," which appeared in 1850, and which Irving meant to make one of his greatest productions. It is, however, an unimportant work. Though it is interesting and abounding in touches of romance, it is radically defective in the lack of philosophic analysis of the character, work, and times of the founder of Islam. Between 1855 and 1859 appeared, in five volumes, the elaborate "Life of Washington," upon which Irving had been thinking or working for thirty years. Here, although Irving's defects as a biographer and historian are occasionally evident, his success is unquestionable. His calmness, serenity, and optimism put him into sympathy with Washington, and his studies of the Revolutionary period are full and accurate, so that an impartial picture of a great man is offered. This quiet and just presentation of Washington's character is probably the one that will endure; certainly there seems no immediate necessity to re-write the story. Of all the historical characters delineated by Irving, the two most strongly brought before the reader's eye are the superficial and tenderly impulsive Goldsmith, and the grave and stately, but not wholly sanctified, Washington.

A collection of miscellaneous papers from The Knickerbocker Magazine was made in 1855, under the title of "Wolfert's Roost"; and two volumes of "Spanish Papers" were put together in 1866, after the author's death. Irving died in 1859, the year made memorable by the departure of two other noted historians, Prescott and Macaulay.

Irving's writings fall, in order of merit, under five classes : essays (including the humorous works), stories, biographies, histories, and travels. Critical Estimate of Writings. It is as an essayist that his rank is highest. Nineteenth-century literature has nothing better of the kind to show than Irving's essays : gentle, winsome, pathetic, delicately humorous, neatly descriptive, and artistic. They have not the wit of Lamb's, but they have more humor, and their literary style is more evenly finished. Their old-fashioned flavor, as though they had been taken from the drawers of an ancient secretary, scented with faded rose-leaves, gives them an added charm. The single volume by Irving which is most certain to live is undoubtedly "The Sketch-Book." In it, besides the author's best essays, are his most original and imaginative stories : "Rip van Winkle" and "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow." The service done to feeble American literature by this remarkable book is not easily to be overestimated ; nor has its place been taken in the following years. Inferior to this, but of genuine merit, are those stories—of which "The Alhambra" shows the most picturesqueness and the "Tales of a Traveller" the most skill—which we shall study in a later volume of this work. Of the biographical writings the winsome and lovely "Life of Goldsmith" and the symmetrical "Life of Washington" of course stand out in clear light. The historical works have deservedly fallen in public esteem ; the genial historian is not always a safe guide, and even the romantic chronicler must see to it that his romance is sternly guided by pitiless accuracy and the philosophy of history. As for the books of travel, they were hack work, unworthy of the reputation of the author, and scarcely belonging to literature at all; they may charitably be omitted from any summary of Irving's achievements.

At the beginning of this chapter the name of Addison was mentioned as that of a precursor of Irving. "Addison," says Taine, "made morality fashionable"; and so Irving, in better but still somewhat coarse days, threw his powerful influence on the side of right and truth, when a nation's literature was beginning to take form. Let me quote from another writer—contrary to my usual custom—a just estimate of this element in his work :

I cannot bring myself to exclude [Irving's moral quality] from a literary estimate, even in the face of the current gospel of art for art's sake. There is something that made Scott and Irving personally loved by the millions of their readers, who had only the dimmest idea of their personality. This was some quality perceived in what they wrote. Each one can define it for himself; there it is, and I do not see why it is not as integral a part of the authors—an element in the estimate of their future position—as what we term their intellect, their knowledge, their skill, or their art. However you rate it, you cannot account for Irving's influence in the world without it. In his tender tribute to Irving, the great-hearted Thackeray, who saw as clearly as anybody the place of mere literary art in the sum total of life, quoted the dying words of Scott to Lockhart,—“Be a good man, my dear.” We know well enough that the great author of “The Newcomes” and the great author of “The Heart of Midlothian” recognized the abiding value in literature of integrity, sincerity, purity, charity, faith. These are beneficences; and Irving's literature, walk round it and measure it by whatever critical instruments you will, is a beneficent literature. The author loved good women and little children and a pure life; he had faith in his fellow-men, a kindly sympathy with the lowest, without any subservience to the highest; he retained a belief in the possibility of chivalrous actions, and did not care to envelop them in a cynical suspicion; he was an author still capable of an enthusiasm. His books are wholesome, full of sweetness and charm, of humor without any sting, of amusement without any stain; and their more solid qualities are marred by neither pedantry nor pretension.*

CHAPTER VIII.

RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY IN LATER YEARS.

WHAT is the connection between theological writing and literature? Shall theology be classed as a division of science, and science ruled out of literature; or shall literature be said to embrace all written matter, and theology be thus included—since no one will deny that of the mass of printed books the religious proportion is huge? An English critic defines literature thus: “By literature we mean the written thoughts and feelings of intelligent men and women, arranged in a way which will give pleasure to the reader.” Granting that “religious literature” expresses the thoughts and feelings of intelligent people, is all of it arranged in a way which gives the reader pleasure? Even if it does, what place shall be assigned it in view of another definition: that real literature must have to do with the ideal, with the imaginative? Would the vast army of creed-makers, of framers of theological systems, of expounders of Scripture, of writers of moral advice, from the “fathers” down to the preachers of to-day, admit that their statements were ideal, imaginative, unreal, and not, every one of them, eternal and immutable truth? Must we be forced to the conclusion that there is no true religious literature save that produced by William Langland or Bunyan of old, and the writers of moral novels and Sunday-school books to-day—many of whom, in their pictures of life, are certainly highly imaginative? Or, on the other hand, may literature, to borrow a phrase from Whittier, “turn the crank of an opinion-mill”?

The answer, I believe, is to be found midway between extreme theories. A good man by Art and ethics; literature and religion. no means necessarily makes a good book, while a bad man may write an admirable one. Art shall not be measured by ethics, while, on the other hand, not one dictate of common-sense shows that ethics, as ethics, should be brought to any artistic test. Other things being equal, the national literatures, the books in a literature, which have most successfully given art a purpose (yet not forgetting that ars est celare artem), have won the greatest success. And purpose surely includes conscience, benefit, progress. This union, for twelve hundred years, has been specially insisted upon by English and American literature; and to it that literature owes many—most—of its triumphs. If Christianity is the best of the world’s religions; if at its best it is, as its founder meant it to be, pre-eminently spiritual and unritualistic and undogmatic, then it ought to exert a powerful influence upon literature. So, in fact, it has, in every age.

Leaving these general propositions for the special application, it should be said that it is true that pure literature should have a large element of the ideal, the imaginative, the unpractical. As literature approaches the commonplace, the worldly, the technical, it loses its power. Theological books and religious writings in general are more closely connected with literature than are books of law, political science, geology, geography, ethnology, chemistry, astronomy, mathematics, etc., because theological books, even at their worst, profess to concern themselves with the unseen, instead of the seen, with the realm of faith, rather than that of observed fact or of conclusions drawn from physical phenomena. Frankly admitting that thousands of religious books belong to literature in no true sense, it is clear that the religious department of the book-making art more nearly approaches the literary domain than does any department of scientific or technical work. Religious writing is not destitute of imagination, sometimes of the loftiest kind ; it often blooms into art or bursts into song ; and ever, at its best, its head is among the stars, though its feet be on the earth. We know little about the future life ; but to religion that life is all-important ; this fact alone tends to idealize religious writing. Therefore, in American literature, as in any other, the ethical, or, indeed, the distinctly theological, division cannot be ignored.

While it must be admitted that American literature has never produced a religious classic, or a religious book distinctly of the first class, it is clear that its religious department has made gains, which, if not commensurate with those in other divisions of intellectual progress, are yet considerable. In intellectual ability, and still more in artistic power and skill, the names of Hooker, Cotton, Williams, the Mathers, Willard, Blair, and Hopkins, are easily surpassed by those of Channing, Hodge, Bushnell, Parker, and Brooks. Even in philosophy, I have no question that future students will rank Porter, Hopkins, or McCosh as philosophers equal to Edwards in ability, though relatively of less significance to their time. If this modest gain continue, American literature, founded by—almost upon—religious purpose, will do service to the cause of art as well as that of religion.

But, by no possibility, can the nineteenth century in America be called a theological era. Only when The theological era past, in America. other literature stagnates, does theology, philosophy, politics, or any science come to the front. These are not natural literary leaders, for reasons too apparent to need explanation.

In the original book-making part of the New World—that is, in New England—theology held undisputed sway until the middle of the eighteenth century, when, by the force of events, Theological changes. politics began to appear as its rival. Speeches, and resolutions, and state papers were more essential than creeds and sermons, in the colonial period between 1760 and 1790, though, of course, America was still “full of religious refugees animated by ideas which in England had lately passed out of fashion.”* Then, too, the new nation, emancipated from colonial relations, grew so rapidly in numbers and material prosperity that dogmatic and controversial theology seemed relatively of small importance. For the first thirty years of its constitutional existence, the United States was also involved in foreign affairs, and was busy in trying to settle the relations between the federal idea and the States'-rights idea. Thus the conspicuous and apparently all-absorbing religious element appeared to pass somewhat into the background.

That it continued to exist, however, and that it was prized by the best Americans as the ground-work of our society and of our thought, The Unitarian revival. was evident at the beginning of this century, and is evident to-day. The first twenty-five years after 1800 were made notable, in the history of American intellect, by a religious controversy that excited the New England churches, and was watched with interest by those outside of New England which did not feel its immediate force. This controversy attended the spread of the Unitarian faith in Massachusetts, particularly in its eastern section. The Congregational churches in that part of the state, and in the seaboard towns of New Hampshire and Maine, had slowly but steadily been modifying their Calvinistic and Augustinian sentiments, even before their creeds and forms were changed. Not a few ministers were regarded with suspicion as being "High-Arians," or "semi-Arians," or at any rate "Arminians"—even by the middle of the eighteenth century. Sermons had become more liberal; the minutiae of the faith were no longer considered of equal importance with its essentials: and now and then some peculiarly "progressive" utterance gave sincere pain to the conservative party. Indeed, as far back as Chief-Justice Sewall's day, at the close of the seventeenth century, Harvard University had been regarded as a subject for suspicion, while Yale College, established in 1700, was already deemed more conservative. In 1785 the first denominational break was made. The oldest Protestant Episcopal—or, as it was then called, "Church of England"—church in New England was King's Chapel, Boston, which, in the early days, the Puritans had feared, detested, or despised, as the case might be. This church, in 1785,* put forth a revised liturgy, prepared by James Freeman, the head of the church, in which all Trinitarian expressions were omitted. In it, as Dr. Freeman's preface stated, no Christian could find aught to offend him or wound his conscience, while "the Trinitarian, the Unitarian, the Calvinist, the Arminian, will read nothing in it which can give him any reasonable umbrage. God is the sole object of worship in these prayers; and as no man can come to God but by the one Mediator, Jesus Christ, every petition is here offered in his name, in obedience to his positive command."

But the book was certainly non-Trinitarian; and the King's Chapel society was no longer either Trinitarian or Episcopal. Young Mr. Freeman, then but twenty-six, was probably the first United States minister to call himself a Unitarian, though an Arian had been ordained over the Hingham Congregational Church as early as 1718. Mr. Freeman, in 1787, was re-ordained pastor of King's Chapel by the wardens and congregation, not at the hands of bishops. The break, as far as the single church was concerned, was complete ; and a similar break was soon made in many Congregational churches.

About 1812, simultaneously with the second war between England and the United States, Its bearing upon literature. the theological war in Massachusetts broke out in earnest. Already the " orthodox " or " evangelical " ministers had refused to exchange pulpits with the avowed Unitarian ministers. The latter, however, strenuously retained the Congregational name, and the churches formerly Trinitarian of course continued their ancient corporate existence and congregational system. Previous to or soon after this date, nearly all of the oldest Congregational churches, established between 1620 and 1650 in such ancient towns as Boston, Cambridge, Dorchester, Dedham, Plymouth, and Salem, joined the new movement. Indeed, the Old South (Third Congregational) Church in Boston was the only prominent society in that city remaining Trinitarian. The details of the movement and of the attendant controversy, of course, cannot be chronicled here. We are chiefly interested in its literary aspects, which were of considerable importance. All New England seemed to have returned to its old-time avocation of religious pamphleteering, and there was no doubt that both sides were terribly in earnest. The most prominent leaders on the side of the conservative, or Trinitarian, Congregationalists, were Samuel Worcester, of Salem, and Professors Moses Stuart and Leonard Woods, of the theological seminary at Andover. The chief Unitarian debaters were William Ellery Channing, Boston's most famous preacher, Henry Ware, senior, Hollis professor of divinity at Harvard, Henry Ware, junior, minister of the Second Church, Boston, and Andrews Norton, professor of sacred literature at Harvard. The whole controversy had really been precipitated by the election, in 1805, of the elder Ware as divinity professor in a university and to a chair once explicitly Trinitarian in their work. The divinity school, and to a large extent the whole university, became Unitarian within the next two decades. The debate was carried on with ability, with intensity, and with as much courtesy as could be expected, in many books, in more pamphlets, in hundreds of sermons, and in such periodicals as The Panoplist (Trinitarian) and The Christian Examiner (Unitarian). Of this mass of destructive and constructive writing, but few books need now be studied. The indirect influence of the freedom of Unitarianism upon American literature—through such writers as Longfellow, Bryant, Lowell, Holmes, Emerson, Hawthorne, Prescott, Bancroft—will sometimes be made apparent, sometimes be but felt, in our later studies of their works.

Of all those who, on either side, took part in the Unitarian controversy, William Ellery Channing put forth the writings most deserving of notice by the literary student. Channing was born in Newport, Rhode Island, during the Revolutionary war, graduated at Harvard when eighteen years old, and was known as a promising student at an early age, notwithstanding his slight frame and ill-health. For his lifetime, indeed, he was virtually an invalid. At twenty-three he was a Boston minister, and before he was thirty the reputation of his finished oratory was more than local. In 1828 he attained some European reputation by his "Remarks on the Life and Character of Napoleon Bonaparte," and long before this the American Unitarians had recognized him as their head. His eloquence, and his familiarity with the political, religious, and literary questions of the day, made him much sought for on anniversary occasions, at ordinations, etc., and he spoke so often and so well that his collected writings form a sort of intellectual history of the time. If, as has been said by a living critic, American literature was born during the administration of Monroe (1817-1825), it owed much of its growth to the constant and beneficial influence of such a creator, critic, and stimulating power as Channing. As a writer, Channing seemed to produce his sentences spontaneously rather than with labor limæ, but his natural grace and acquired art stood him in good stead. Behind his straightforward and seemingly artless words were strength of opinion and a well-stored mind; in his own idea he was simply delivering his message and saying his say; but his hearers knew him to be eloquent. The sanctity of the rights of the individual conscience had never been so portrayed by an American divine; and in this regard he was the direct intellectual precursor of Emerson and the Transcendentalists. Preaching, to him, meant the arousing of the sense of duty to conscience, to one's own personal character, and thus to fellow-men and to God. The peculiar stamp Channing gave to Unitarianism has not been lost. He might have declared his motto to be the words of a later thinker: "Who follows truth carries his star in his brain." His morals were intuitive; his idea of the character and possible development of man was based upon the constant thought that men are rather sons of God than worms of the dust. This idea he carried into all his writings: sermons, addresses, literary criticisms, essays, and papers on peace, anti-slavery, and temperance.

But Channing cannot be called an age-compelling force. As a religious reformer, he was no Luther, Savonarola, or Knox; he even lacked the incisive qualities which, in the cruder American period, had marked Cotton Mather and Jonathan Edwards. To some of his contemporaries he appeared timid; the radical wings of the Unitarians thought him altogether too conservative; and the Garrisonian Abolitionists were by no means satisfied with his methods of opposing slavery. He was serene, benign, spiritual; and sometimes the work-a-day world seemed to need a more rugged helper than he. Even in the great Unitarian controversy he was not exactly a party leader. His influence was due to the fact that the sanctity of the individual conscience was ever in his mind; and that therefore he deemed the preacher's function to announce, to collect all the facts and arguments and bring them before the hearer, who would draw his own conclusions. "Seek truth, and when found, ever follow it," he seemed to say. In his serenity, as well as in this insistence upon the rights of the individual mind, he was, as I have said, the immediate forerunner of Emerson. From "Channing Unitarianism" to "Emersonianism" was intellectually a logical step, though the former was, and is, a conservative influence in the denomination. Channing's conclusions differed from Emerson's; their methods were in essentials the same.

The literary influence of Channing was twofold. The intrinsic merit of his writings, which are broad in range, earnest in tone, graceful in style, and at times highly eloquent, is considerable. It is not usual for a theologian to be read half a century after death, and such has been Channing's good fortune. Yet it would be too much to call him one of the first American authors, if we limit the adjective to writers of the grade of Emerson, Hawthorne, Lowell, Longfellow, or Bryant. His work was valuable, because it was both a sign of and an influence toward, that indigenious culture which America was beginning to show. If America, between 1820 and 1840, with all her intellectual crudities and follies, was displaying something of the academic spirit and work, and some foretaste of "sweetness," some dawn of "light," she owed the boon, in considerable measure, to the fact that Channing lived and wrote. That gracious element in him which led Longfellow to exclaim: "Servant of God, well done," or Lowell to call him "good man, good angel now," fortunately influenced American literature, which in its early days had lacked the serenity that marked Channing's work.

The survival of the reputation of Dr. Channing beyond the controversial period in which he lived, has been due, of course, to the literary character of his work, rather than to the prominent part he took in the development of American Unitarianism. Theological movements, however potent, do not usually leave upon literature any commensurate mark. The canons of art stand aside from those of ethics, though powerfully affected by them; and intensity of conviction, in religion, is no more sure to effect a literary result than is zeal or success in politics. American theological literature is perhaps less significant—certainly it is less original—than American political literature. New England Calvinism, while it lasted, was of course not indigenous, nor was the later New England Unitarianism, nor the American “broad church” movement in various denominations. The spirit of the country favors freedom, and therefore the various liberal movements in religion might be expected to flourish better in America than in Europe. In fact, however, there is no religious liberality in America, and no phase of religious literature, not easily paralleled in London, Oxford, Edinburgh, Paris, or Leyden. The Unitarian movement in the United States differed in extent and in literary importance, not in nature, from similar movements abroad. Different conditions produce different results; where, in one intellectual community, Calvinistic Congregationalism rules, the spirit of change takes one form; where the Church of England establishment dominates society, it takes another.

The type of conservative Unitarianism of which Channing's name is the representative, was Andrews Norton, 1786-1853. existent and influential in biblical criticism as well as in argumentative discourse or in devout essays. Andrews Norton, while attacking the doctrine of the Trinity on scriptural grounds, defended the genuineness of the gospels in a patient and scholarly four-volume exposition. Another prominent name of the time, on the Unitarian side, was that of Orville Dewey, who bore to New York the message delivered by Channing in Boston. Orville Dewey, 1794-1882. His creed, his method, and his intellectual and spiritual nature closely resembled those of his friend Channing, to whom in youth he had been assistant minister ; but the distinctly literary ability of his sermons and other writings was less ; and, unlike Channing, he was not a power in philanthropy, nor did he make his influence felt in literary criticism. Upon his thoughtful and reverent lectures on "The Problem of Human Destiny" his present literary reputation chiefly rests. But it is the misfortune (in one sense) of the minister, however earnest and able, that his books and sermons, unless of striking and significant force, or of literary ability so high as to give them a renown aside from that due to their moral mission, are not widely remembered or often read. We think of what clergymen did, or perhaps of what they were, but not of what they are in literature.

The same remark is true of Leonard Woods, the elder, theological professor at Andover, and one of the most strenuous opponents of the rising Unitarian-

ism. "A Reply to Dr. Ware's Letters," a "Reply to Leonard Woods, 1774-1854. Mr. Mahan on the Doctrine of Perfection," "Lectures on the Inspiration of the Scriptures," or even "Memoirs of American Missionaries," cannot long hold their readers, after the important events that called them forth are no longer before the mind. The later reader looks respectfully upon the five-volume collection of "Woods' Works," and passes on. By the side of Dr. Woods at Andover stood a man of greater intellectual strength, Moses Stuart, also for years a theological professor, who attacked Unitarianism by biblical commentaries, by translations of German doctrinal histories, and by miscellaneous writings. Stuart, in advance of many scholars in his day, perceived that a familiarity with German critical, exegetical, and historical literature was essential to the conservative not less than to the radical. The spirituality and the discreet liberalism of Schleiermacher and other Germans of kindred mind were beginning to be used as allies by the conservative Congregationalists of New England, who, like Stuart, were not content to let "German culture" be deemed the property of Emerson or Parker alone.

A more intense spirit of attack, and a more aggressive disposition, characterized Lyman Beecher. The old conservative or "orthodox" party among the Congregationalists of New England did not lack defenders. Save in Eastern Massachusetts, and in a few towns elsewhere, it remained in possession of the field; and if Harvard University had been lost, Yale, Bowdoin, Dartmouth, Williams, and the new Amherst continued to represent various grades of the Trinitarian Congregational faith. Yale, perhaps, was the stronghold among the colleges, at least down to the first quarter of the present century, when the quarrel between "Taylorism" and "Tylerism" reached its height; but even Yale was distrusted by the conservatives, who set up a rival and indubitably "sound" seminary on East Windsor Hill, to counteract the lax influence of the theological department in New Haven. This was after the year (1797) in which Beecher graduated at Yale. Studying theology under President Dwight, he grew strong in the faith; and when, afterwards, he was minister over a country church at Litchfield, Connecticut, his renown as a powerful orthodox preacher spread beyond the community in which he lived, and ultimately led to his removal to Boston, the Unitarian centre, that there he might carry on the controversy. His name, for the years of his Boston residence, and previous to them, was the synonym for Trinitarianism in the pulpit, as Channing's was for Unitarianism. In preaching, more than in book-making, appeared his force and fire.

Meanwhile the old Presbyterian college of New Jersey at Princeton, though not directly affected by the church secessions, the social distinctions, and the pulpit-and-pamphlet controversies of the latitude of Boston, was earnestly defending the Calvinistic creed as understood by the Reformed churches (Presbyterian, Dutch, and German) on the Continent, in England, and in the United States. Several of its presidents or professors became influential by reason of their commentaries, or doctrinal treatises, or articles in the Princeton Review; but from the names of the many, two stand out in specially clear light : those of Archibald Alexander, in the first part of the nineteenth century, and Charles Hodge, in the middle of the century. Dr. Alexander was the first professor in the theological seminary at Princeton, which is not connected with the college in corporate bonds, but of course works on parallel lines. Archibald Alexander shaped and gave tone to his seminary, and to "Princeton theology,"—with its austerity of doctrine and its benignity of life,—a type in several ways different from the Puritan. Alexander's "Outlines of the Evidences of Christianity," the first of his several works, was long a favorite and a force. He and his fellows, however, were pioneers rather than creators in their theological work, so far as the ultimate crystallization of Princeton theology was concerned. They wrote much, and sometimes strongly; they taught patiently, and affected American thought, particularly in the Middle States. But it was left to Charles Hodge to produce the one American theological treatise which can be called monumental, and which, by its ability, dignity, thoroughness, and extent, worthily states an entire system of religious faith, as believed and taught by its author, and by the church or school of thought to which he belonged. No other religious work produced in this country seriously rivals it in these particulars. Other faiths have been believed as sincerely and urged as ably, but none has received a similarly full, systematic statement. Certainly the New England Congregationalists, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, earnestly believed in the religion which was their all-in-all, but none of them, save Samuel Willard and Samuel Hopkins, attempted to put forth a complete theological system, such as is presented in Hodge's "Systematic Theology." "Edwardsianism" and "Hopkinsianism" were names of doctrinal influences, not limited to the writings of Edwards or Hopkins. To frame a systematic theology demanded a thoroughness of theological scholarship which neither Willard, Edwards, nor Hopkins possessed. As for the Mathers, they dissipated their powers in a hundred directions, and so left no adequate support for their once great renown. Other old churches in the United States—the Protestant Episcopal, the Reformed, the Lutheran, the Moravian, the Roman Catholic—have depended upon foreign authorities in this line of work, while such great Arminian bodies as the Methodists and the Disciples of Christ have seemed to feel unwilling or unable to map out the whole "scheme of salvation," and to draw up a constitution for the government of this world and the next. Similar considerations would appear to have unconsciously influenced the Unitarians, whose doctrinal differences are almost as great as those in the Anglican churches, and who certainly have failed as completely in systematic theology, or in the whole department of the religious treatise, as they have succeeded in their influence exerted upon and through literature in general.

The better Congregational literature of the nineteenth century, since the Unitarian controversy, has differed materially from that which, on the Trinitarian side, preceded or accompanied that controversy. To the already formidable list of American isms and ologies was added, a generation ago, "Bushnellism." To most modern readers this new influence seems wholesome and sufficiently conservative; to Dr. Bushnell's neighbors on East Windsor Hill it appeared little better than the secessions of 1800-1820.

Horace Bushnell, 1802-1876. Dr. Bushnell's "moral influence" theory of the Atonement was nothing new; it was, and is, held in substance by the great Broad Church school in the Church of England; but it did differ, undoubtedly and materially, from that formerly prevalent—and still extant—in parts of New England. Dr. Bushnell was born in Lyman Beecher's old county of Litchfield, Connecticut, but Litchfield theology was changed by his potent words. His "Vicarious Sacrifice" (1855), carefully setting forth the views which might fairly be called those of "liberal orthodoxy," powerfully affected later Congregationalism; while in this and other books he displayed a strength and freshness of thought, and a characteristic and original style, which he often applied to other than religious themes. Sometimes obscure, often quaint, and now and then un-rhetorical or even ungrammatical, he always has something to say. His "Moral Uses of Dark Things" is probably to be reckoned, on the whole, his principal book, notwithstanding the interest once aroused by his "God in Christ"; "Christ in Theology"

(a defence of the previous book, made to the Hartford Central Association of Ministers, in 1849); "Views of Christian Nurture" (on revivalism); "Work and Play" (essays and addresses); "Sermons for the New Life"; "Nature and the Supernatural"; or the elaborate "Vicarious Sacrifice" treatise, previously mentioned. Bushnell the theologian was, like Robertson, Maurice, or Kingsley, in England, a genuine stimulating force upon many of the younger Congregationalists of New England; and Bushnell the essayist—now reminding one of Carlyle, now of Ruskin, but ever original—resembled Emerson, though, of course, in a small degree, in his broadcast spreading of seeds of thought. The title of "The Moral Uses of Dark Things" is a promise of the character of the chapters contained in the book. Let us take a single extract, at random, from these essays, illustrating his general style and his apt use of simple words, and also showing how he turns the very pessimism of all past history to the service of optimism:

God, for some reason, scrutible or inscrutable, has determined to let large tracts of past events be "The Moral always passing into oblivion; and though it dis- Uses of Dark Things. appoints, to a certain extent, that filial instinct which unites us to the past, and puts us on the search to find, if possible, who are gone before us and what they have done, I think we shall discover uses enough, and those which are sufficiently beneficent, to comfort us in the loss.

And, first of all, it will be seen that we do not lose our benefit in the past ages, because we love the remembrance of their acts and persons. Do the vegetable growths repine or sicken because they cannot remember the growths of the previous centuries? Is it not enough that the very soil that feeds them is fertilized by the waste of so many generations mouldering in it? The principal and best fruits of the past ages come down to us, even when their names do not. If they wrought out great inventions, these will live without a history. If they unfolded great principles of society and duty, great principles do not die. If they brought their nation forward into power and a better civilization, the advances made are none the less real that their authors are forgotten. Their family spirit passed into their family, and passes down with it. Their manners and maxims and ideas flavored their children; then, after them, their children's children, and so more truly live than they would in a book. About every thing valuable in a good and great past is garnered in oblivion; not to be lost, but to be kept and made fruitful. For it is not true that we have our advantage in the past ages mainly in what we draw from their example, or gather from the mistakes of their experience. We have our benefit in what they transmit, not in what we go after and seek to copy. And passing into causes, they transmit about every thing they are; and, to a great extent, their corrections for what they are not; producing emendations probably in us, that are better than they could find how to make in themselves.

But we do not really strike the stern moral key of Providence in this general sentence of oblivion passed upon the race, till we make full account of the fact that the major part of our human history is bad in the matter of it. This, to some, will seem uncharitable, or unduly severe; but if they feel it necessary to be offended, they have only to run over the general bill of written history, and see what makes the staple matter of the record, to perceive how faithfully the stricture holds. Very few good men, and very few really great deeds figure in the record. Great wrongs, oppressions, usurpations, enmities, desolations of unholy war, persecutions of righteousness and truth, are the chief headings of the chapters. The eminent characters are, for the most part, eminently bad, or even abominably wicked. And when the staple matter of the story is less revolting, it is generally not because there is a better mind or motive, but only because an immense cloak of hypocrisy is habitually drawn over actions, to make them less disgusting and more decent-looking than they really are. Nothing prodigiously bad is done by many, simply because of the mean, dastardly, selfish spirit which dares not heartily do the evil it thinks. In this view, as I conceive, the major part of man's history is bad—better, therefore, to be forgotten than to be remembered; pitch it down under all-merciful oblivion, and let both sight and smell of it be gone forever. We want a clean atmosphere, and there is no way to give it but to let the reeking filth and poison pass off. Even if we did not copy so many bad things cramming our memory, it would cost us incredible damage simply to be meeting and taking the look, every moment, of these bad images, whether we copy them or not. We could not be familiar with such types of evil without being fouled by them, and, therefore, God has mercifully ordained a limbo into which they may be gathered and sunk out of sight. Who could be less than a reprobate, having all the monster villainies of the past ages crowded into his memory, and compelling him to have their touch upon his feeling day and night? But as God has ordered the world, he is all the while making it morally habitable, by successive purgations. He permits us to breathe safely in permitting us to know almost nothing of the bad past. And the institution of written history does not very much vary our condition. Who of us does not remember instances of very bad and very brilliant men, who were the common talk of their times, but are now less and less frequently mentioned, and will shortly be quite forgot? Good men are not so easily forgotten; partly because they are more rare; partly because they take hold of respect, which is firmer and more fixed than memory; and partly because their good is closer to the principle of immortality, imbibing life therefrom. Hence they stay longer, lingering as benignant stars in the sky, while the bad and wicked are mercifully doomed to make blank spaces for them, and contribute what of benefit they can by their absence. "The name of the wicked shall rot,"—this is their gospel; which, if it be wholly negative, is so far grandly salutary.

Through this whole remarkable book Bushnell shows how

" thro' the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widen'd with the process of the suns."

The great moral use of dark things is their directing us to the Ideal :

It is a very great thing for us morally that we shape so many ideals, for we escape, in doing it, the awfully foul tyranny of facts; and our ideals are just as much more real than the facts, as they are better and closer to the wants of character.

This is the word of poetry as truly as it is the word of Christianity.

While Bushnell was a stimulating—almost a creating—force in American religious thought, he had no confidence in "systematic orthodoxy," or "the possibility, in human language, of an exact theologic science." Great and awful and helpful and joyous truth must ever, in his view, be expressed in symbolic and spiritual language, not in mathematical or Athanasian. He prepared the way for some later developments in New England theology, whereby the rights of the local church were asserted against Connecticut "consociationism" in Congregational-

ism ; whereby the Bible was deemed holy because of its holy message ; and whereby Christian preaching was " Christocentric " rather than theologic or systematic : dealing with the person and work and teaching of Jesus Christ our Lord, rather than with particular modes of thinking about the relations between the Father, the Son, and man.

Between Horace Bushnell and Henry Ward Beecher, as representatives of later Congregationalism, there is some general similarity, but they differ in many ways. Bushnell was beloved as a preacher, and influenced his hearers ; but his principal work was with his pen. Beecher, though a constant and voluminous writer, has chiefly exerted power in the pulpit or on the lecture-platform. Bushnell has stimulated ministers and the writing class ; Beecher's work has principally affected separate hearers, not belonging to the literary or the ministerial set—receivers, not producers. His theological position has widely differed from that of his father, Lyman Beecher, for he has actively and constantly, from the beginning of his ministry, supported the more liberal Congregational ideas ; in his later life, for instance, heartily accepting the theory of evolution, and introducing it into his religious teachings. During his whole career, until the close of the civil war and the abolition of slavery, he was an earnest Abolitionist, and in England, during the war, his speeches aided the Union cause. Possessed of an unusually and almost untiringly fertile mind, naturally eloquent, and ever a man of affairs as well as of the ministerial life, his words have been welcomed by thousands, whom his enthusiasm, his original way of "putting things," and his helpful temper have benefited. For years his sermons—and at times his prayers—have been stenographically reported and published; and quick currency has been given to his political, philanthropic, and miscellaneous lectures. Written without deep or minute study, still his words are seldom crude, and sometimes are highly finished; while the thought behind them, whatever its demerits, is intense, and the thinker's own.

It seems to be certain, however, that Mr. Beecher's reputation in literature will in no way equal his contemporary renown as a speaker. Upon what could such a reputation rest? Not upon his amiable novel, "Norwood"; not upon the little essays called "Star Papers"; not upon such weightier but fragmentary works as the "Lectures to Young Men," "Life Thoughts," or "Royal Truths;"; not upon his ambitious "Life of Christ," easily surpassed by Farrar's or by Geikie's, among contemporary writings. His sermons are his real literary work; and most of them, written rapidly or even extemporized, lack the literary form which printed sermons must show if they are to carry the preacher's actual work, and not his past fame, to succeeding generations. A speech or sermon, possessing fine form, may be deemed great by later generations, even if its original hearers, like Burke's, did not honor it. On the contrary, the orator or preacher, like the actor or the general, may kindle and fuse to a white heat the minds of his listeners, and yet, because he lacks the high art which shall save the printed word, he shall be more talked of than read, more remembered than known. Mr. Beecher has deliberately adopted his method, has secured its resulting influence and fame, and would be the last to complain that a widely different success, based upon another method, was not won. Contemporary American thought has been much affected by his work; true American literature, little.

The student of religious thought in the United States, during the last quarter of the nineteenth century, notes an important development later than that in which Bushnell or Beecher took part. This development may be described in the popular term, "Andover theology," which, as defined by its adherents and promoters, is simply "Progressive Orthodoxy." The object of The Andover Review, as explained in its prospectus, was "not contro- The Andover Review. versy, but positive and constructive work in the sphere of opinion and belief. Recognizing the fact that no age can honorably refuse to face the more serious problems which confront it, there will be no hesitancy in candidly investigating and discussing the vital questions of the present." Or again, to quote from an article in the first number, entitled, "The Theological Purpose of the Review," the periodical and the later Andover or liberal Congregational theology sought "to revive the primitive consciousness of spiritual truth; to realize the living gospel out of which came the gospel that apostles preached; to require that ecclesiastical confessions and dogmas and all theological creeds and systems prove themselves, if they can, to be truly Apostolic and Biblical by showing that they are genuinely Christian. This is not to set up a higher standard than Apostolic authority or Sacred Scripture. It simply requires us to understand what such phrases mean; that the letter is not the spirit, though we cannot find the spirit save by the help of the letter; that the Bible is an organism whose life is in the Incarnate Word; that Christ is the subject of Christian dogma, as well as its revealer; that all religious truth has its unity in Him. Theology is the science of God. God is revealed in Christ. The possibility, the unity, the verification of a science of divinity are given in Him, and in Him alone." Or, again, in a single noble sentence: "Christianity is essentially a credo, not a ceremonial, nor a cultus, nor a system of types and symbols, nor a prophecy, but a revelation through a divine revealer,—a faith, a creed."

The leading idea of the Christian working scholars of Andover—we like this expression better than "Andover theologians"—is the Christocentric idea. Christianity is and lives; its tests are present and vital tests, not merely the ipse dixit of a Pope or a mediæval Protestant creed-maker, or ritualism, however ancient, or "confessions of faith," however mandatory, or even the elaborate development of Messianic prophecy and the scheme of redemption. Christianity possesses its Bible, its history, its churches and ministers, its creeds and forms, and is not possessed by them; and of Christianity Christ, not any system of thinking about Christ, is the centre. This thought, though held by many in all ages, was newly and strongly emphasized by the men at Andover, as also by an ever-increasing number of Congregationalists represented by Professor George T. Ladd of Yale, in his two-volume work on "The Doctrine of Sacred Scripture"; by many and potent "Broad Church" Episcopalians in England and the United States; by some devout Unitarians; and by others of several Christian denominational names.

This idea of Christianity has been expressed with special strength and with wide influence by Phillips Brooks, the most eminent preacher produced by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. That body has not lacked ministers of ability, but none has really rivalled Phillips Brooks as an effective pulpit orator, a master of English, or a spiritual force. The spirituality of Dr. Brooks' writing is its most apparent quality, marking all his sermons and other public utterances; and to this is added the power of stating truths in telling words, such as these: "There is a heaven and an earth in every man"; or in phrases like "the long day of eternity"; or in distinctions such as that which he makes between "working creeds and ultimate truth." Cannot his whole temper and life-purpose be stated in those words of his?—"The more Christ becomes simply and absolutely known, the more the missionary spirit will grow and deepen and extend, until, with the perfection of a simplified Christianity, there will at last come the conversion of the world."*

Turning back again to Unitarianism for a moment, mention should be made of two tendencies, both of which affected American literature, and both of which were later than the Channing-Dewey period. The first is conservative Unitarianism of the type represented by the King's Chapel liturgy (Boston), the sermons of ex-president Hill of Harvard in the First Church, Portland, and the words, during many years, of Dr. A. P. Peabody, preacher to the Harvard students. Dr. Peabody differed from a Trinitarian Congregationalist in little save terminology; and his conservative and devout lectures were acceptable when delivered in the Congregational seminary at Andover, or the Presbyterian seminary in New York. To the young men whom he so often addressed, and indeed to all who came within reach of his sermons, his message continued to emphasize Channing's idea of conscience in the soul, in such words as those uttered in one of his last baccalaureates :

Consult honestly and diligently with yourselves, and your experience will transcend your hopes. Failure will be success, and loss, gain. No man of my years, whether his fortune has been prosperous or adverse, whether he has been a good man or a bad man, if he will only say what he knows, will fail to tell you that happiness is contingent on character—that he who has this, even if he have nothing else, is as one possessing all things. May he who in an undying and infallible conscience is your true guide be with you on your whole life way, and may Jesus Christ, the incarnate law and love of God, himself the eternal life made manifest, have you on earth and in heaven for his faithful followers.

Midway between the conservative and the radical Unitarians stand such preachers and writers as James Freeman Clarke, allied to the ^{James Free-}man Clarke, "Channing Unitarians" by his reverential ^{b. 1810.} spirit and non-iconoclastic temper, and yet willing to study and to get benefit from advanced and novel schools of thought, within and without his own denomination. Thus when The North American Review and The Christian Examiner (the leading Unitarian review) stood somewhat aloof from Ralph Waldo Emerson and his fellows, and from Carlyle and his influence, Dr. Clarke attended the Transcendental meetings and corresponded with the leaders of the movement. Of Clarke, Dr. Holmes says, in his "Life of Emerson": "This high-minded and brave-souled man . . . did not wait until he [Emerson] was famous to be his admirer and champion." * But in his books—"The Christian Doctrine of Forgiveness," "The Christian Doctrine of Prayer," "Steps of Belief," "Orthodoxy, its Truths and Errors," and "Common-Sense in Religion," we find a distinct Christian sentiment by no means universally prevalent in the Transcendental movement. Dr. Clarke, while sharing in most of the intellectual movements which affected New England thought after 1830, left—like another thoughtful Unitarian minister of the liberal-conservative order, Dr. Frederic Henry Hedge—no original, formative literary work of the first class, his labor having been chiefly in the constant exercise of preaching. Clarke's "Ten Great Religions" (two series), though interesting, is rather an industrious gleaning in previously tilled fields, than a force such as one feels at first-hand in Max Müller's lectures on comparative religion.

Of all the later Unitarian liberals—represented by such men as William Rounseville Alger, author of "A Critical History of the Doctrine of the Future Life," or John Weiss, who wrote a set of essays entitled "American Religion"—the prototype was, Theodore Parker,* of course, Theodore Parker.* After the 1810-1860. days of Channing and Lyman Beecher, and before the time of Phillips Brooks, Parker was decidedly the most conspicuous of the Boston preachers. A radical of radicals, the man from whom the name "Parkerite Unitarians" was derived, he was yet, within the limits of his faith, of an intensely devout nature. Working, for the most part, outside of denominational lines, and indeed refused admission to many Unitarian pulpits, as far as his theism was concerned he would have been regarded, by the agnostics of the next generation, as a reactionary. Parker's sense of the personality and the loving fatherhood of God, of his ever-immanent power in his universe, of his direct

* The best (English) edition of Parker's collected works is edited by Francis Power Cobbe, and contains, in fourteen volumes, his "theological, polemical, and critical writings, sermons, speeches and addresses, and literary miscellanies." The order is as follows: Vol. 1, "A Discourse of Religion." Vol. 2, "Ten Sermons, and Prayers." Vol. 3, "Discourse of Theology." Vol. 4, "Discourse of Politics." Vols. 5 and 6, "Discourses of Slavery." Vol. 7, "Discourses of Social Science." Vol. 8, "Miscellaneous Discourses." Vols. 9 and 10, "Critical and Miscellaneous Writings." message to the soul of his creature, and of the tender love which should go out from man to his Maker, as it ever descends from Divinity to man, was of Hebraic character. As minister of the "Twenty-eighth Congregational Society," Boston, which worshipped in the large Music Hall, Parker proved himself an eloquent preacher, and notwithstanding the heterogeneous character of his congregation, the personal esteem and affection which he aroused made him a pastor in the old-fashioned sense of the word. His sermons discussed many questions affecting the relations of Christianity to its own subdivisions, and to the world. Abolitionism and various social reforms found in him an ardent champion; he constantly discussed political themes; and various literary topics he treated with ability. At least one of his miscellaneous works—"Historic Americans"—seems likely to live; and a similar good fortune may possibly attend his "Lessons from the World of Matter and the World of Man." Parker was an omnivorous reader, and studied tirelessly a great many languages; but his native and alert critical powers were never greatly aided by his broad but not deep studies. Like Beecher of Brooklyn, Parker preached, and let his stimulating words fall upon what ears they might. The progress of liberal thought in Boston was greatly aided by him, and Boston political conservatism was correspondingly weakened. To sum up his work, it may be said that it was a work of intensely aggressive theism, moving partly on Christian lines, toward religious and civil changes.

His theism, in its character and force, is best illustrated in his volume of printed prayers—the only noteworthy contribution ever made in America to this once prominent department of literature. Parker was the last of the preachers whose words and works have had any general effect on American thought, in so far as that thought has concerned itself with movements associated with individual names. Parker was at times superficial, sensational, noisy, and indiscreet; but for mere discretion and prudence he had small liking, while his uproarious method of attack he deemed necessary, in his endeavor to overthrow ancient evils. His superficiality was due to his boundless energy, which prematurely wore out his life, and to his desire to absorb all knowledge. But, after all, he was a characteristic American figure; and his position in the religion and politics of discreetly liberal Boston, before the war, is half pathetic, half comic. Of him Lowell wrote, in kindly humor:

“There he stands, looking more like a ploughman than priest,

If not dreadfully awkward, not graceful at least,
His gestures all downright and same, if you will,
As of brown-fisted Hobnail in hoeing a drill,
But his periods fall on you, stroke after stroke,
Like the blows of a lumberer felling an oak.
You forget the man wholly, you 're thankful to meet
With a preacher who smacks of the field and the street,
And to hear, you 're not over-particular whence,
Almost Taylor's profusion, quite Latimer's sense.”*

In considering the earlier development of philosophy in America, it has been seen that the chief purpose of its study was to support certain systems of theology. Few philosophical students in the United States have started de novo to examine the nature and processes of mind, without reference to any particular religious system. Honest and able thinkers there have been, free from any avowed or consciously held purpose to enslave thought, but still it remains true that theology, not philosophy, has usually been the mistress. It has been more common to defend religion by philosophy, than to find religion in philosophy. Therefore American work in this department has not been original, though nowhere else have existing principles of intellectual, religious, and political freedom been more successfully applied to the circumstances of life. American philosophical study has been content to utilize rather than to originate. The study of German philosophy has followed, in America, that of Scotch and English philosophy, and Kant and Hegel have strengthened the idealism first made known in America by Coleridge. Platonism, from Bishop Berkeley to Ralph Waldo Emerson and the Concord School of Philosophy, has found a ready welcome west of the Atlantic. American students are now little inclined to follow Edwards in the endeavor to prop up Calvinistic theology by philosophical supports; but religion has gained because Hegelianism and Platonism, as interpreted in America, have established or strengthened a genuine theism and optimism.

Remembering, therefore, that many useful books have been produced by numerous American ministers, professors, and private students, but regarding the possession of some original quality as of paramount importance in our present notice of the comparatively slight achievements of philosophy in the New World, only a few names separate themselves from a large number.*

One of the first American students of philosophy to pursue investigations beyond the usual point was Laurens Perseus Hickok, b. 1798. Dr. L. P. Hickok, whose books contain a strong element of originality. Hickok has been, to a limited extent, the founder of a school of thought. His work has been that of a teacher in college or theological seminary, and president of Union College, but in his writings the usual distinctly theological purpose has been minimized. He has studied speculative philosophy for its own sake. The subdivisions of his investigations are indicated by the titles of his works: "Rational Psychology," "Empirical Psychology," "Rational Cosmology," "Creator and Creation; or, The Knowledge in the Reason of God and His Work," "Humanity Immortal; or, Man Tried, Fallen, and Redeemed," and, finally and chiefly, "The Logic of Reason." His thoughts and methods, though deeply influenced by Kant, are largely original, and so undoubtedly is his peculiar, intricate, and sometimes almost unintelligible, English style.* Philosophy is an abstruse subject, but not a few philosophers have written "sun-clear statements"; of such writers, Dr. Hickok is not one. The leading endeavor of most of his books has been, in the words of his most energetic follower and able expounder, President Julius H. Seelye, of Amherst College, to set forth "the necessary distinctions in the intellectual functions of the sense, the understanding, and the reason." This is, of course, the Kantian endeavor. Hickok has done more than any other man to spread Kantianism in America, and his influence—directly, and through his followers, Dr. Seelye and President John Bascom of Wisconsin University—has probably been greater than that of any other American writer in this department of thought. Hickok's theology becomes theistic and supernatural by the following steps: the sense observes external facts, the understanding systematizes observations and draws the more obvious conclusions from them, and the reason seeks and finds remoter and grander causes of these noted and arranged effects. Thus Hickok reaches, by philosophy, somewhat the same result that Agassiz reached by science: "I find it impossible to attribute biological phenomena, which have been, and still are, going on upon the surface of the globe, to the simple action of physical forces. I believe they are due, in their entirety, as well as individually, to the direct intervention of a creative power, acting freely, and in an autonomic way."* Hickok also finds in the individuality of the mind, and in the power of reason to investigate its own nature, and to regulate its own acts, the secret of man's superiority to other created things, and man's struggle upward toward good and God.

* It is not necessary, whatever their useful work, to trace how James Marsh followed Kant or Coleridge, or Thomas C. Upham Dugald Stewart, or Francis Wayland Thomas Reid, etc. The popularization of Kantian and Coleridgean spiritualism, through Marsh and others, was the most important work done by these transmitters of European philosophy.

The numerous writings of the well-known head of another American college, President Mark Hopkins Mark Hopkins,
b. 1802. of Williams, differ materially from those of Dr. Hickok in the matter of style. If Hickok is obscure and knotty, Hopkins is almost invariably clear and attractive. In Hopkins' books: "Evidences of Christianity," "Moral Science," "The Law of Love, and Love as a Law," "An Outline Study of Man; or, The Body and Mind in one System," "The Scriptural Idea of Man," the ethical purpose is more obvious, and earlier avowed than in those of Hickok; but Hopkins seeks to reduce mere assumptions to a minimum, and not to allow theory to lose sight of proof. In his writings, we find traces of the influence of Kant, an influence not unfelt by any later American philosopher. Hopkins denies what Hamilton asserts: that by faith we "apprehend that which is beyond our knowledge," but holds with Kant, in opposition to Reid, that we have intuitive knowledge, direct knowledge, of invisible and supersensible things. Through and through Hopkins is a transcendentalist and anti-agnostic. His teachings illustrate the yielding, in America, of Reid and "common-sense" philosophy to the influence of Germany and spiritual intuitions. In Hopkins, a Trinitarian Congregational minister, in many ways a conservative, and sometimes following the Edwardsian statements, appears an optimism not less serene than that of Emerson himself. In an essay on this very theme, which in some ways restates the author's whole position and life-work, Dr. Hopkins says :

There have been those who have stood under the starry heavens, and in contrasting the immensity of the universe as revealed by modern science with the earth, as a mere speck, and with man, in his brief day upon it, have felt that the great doctrines of the incarnation, and of redemption by the Son of God, could not be true. The impression is natural, and at times overwhelming, and yet it is but an impression. Seen in its true light, the very significance of the earth and the low rank of man are the indispensable condition for the fullest display of the divine attributes, and so, for that is the same thing, of the divine glory. Nor, in the light of modern science, is the obscurity of this earth, and the apparent insignificance of what takes place upon it, any bar to its fullest publicity in the remotest world in space, if so be that intelligent beings dwell there. When science says, as it does, that the action of gravitation is instantaneous throughout space, it shuts the mouth of incredulity when we assert a possible sympathy and unity of a higher kind in the intelligent universe of God.

Knowing, then, that God could not be better than he is; that the love revealed in Christ could not be greater than it is; that the heaven provided for those who love God could not be more blessed than it is; finding in the Scriptures as much of optimism as we had a right to expect; finding also in them a revelation of a future which gives a possible key to the fearful perplexities of the present state, we welcome each gleam of light, and wait with patience and hope the coming of that perfect day of "the restitution of all things of which God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." In the coming of such a day, thus revealed, we find that solution of the mystery of the present state for which our whole nature cries out. Is it the true solution? If not, there is no solution; and if there be no solution, and man is never to find a reality that shall correspond with his highest ideal, we must have, at the point of failure, the grating and wail of a hopeless and an eternal dissonance in the creation of God.*

Into this gracious and winsome statement of faith has Edwardsianism changed in New England—the ism whose founder once said: "The God that holds you sinners over the pit of hell, much as one holds a spider or some loathsome insect over the fire, abhors you . . . he will crush you under his feet without mercy; he will crush out your blood, and make it fly, and it shall be sprinkled on his garments, so as to stain all his raiment." †

Philosophical writing (rather than what is called philosophical speculation) has been, for some reason, a favorite avocation of American college presidents. Edwards was president of the College of New Jersey; Hickok and Hopkins were the heads of Union College and Williams College; and, books on philosophy have also been produced by Noah Porter, president of Yale, and James McCosh, a successor of Edwards at Princeton. Dr.

Porter's principal work, "The Human Intellect," appeared in 1868, when the author had ^{Noah Porter,} been professor of philosophy at Yale ^{b. 1811.} for twenty-two years. This book, since revised and accompanied by an abridgment, represents the author's mature philosophical system, after a life-long study of ancient and contemporary philosophy. It is both a text-book, in its statement of general principles, and a treatise for scholars, in its amplifications and more detailed arguments. Of large bulk, its style is nevertheless didactic and terse rather than diffuse; it is a collection of philosophical dicta, not a continuous essay or amalgamated and unified treatise. It comprehends within its covers a general history of philosophy, and the definitions and statements formulated by the leading thinkers of the world. Dr. Porter is influenced by German terminology, to some extent, but in his original work chiefly follows the methods of Scotch philosophy. "Common-sense" and "self-consciousness" are taking words, but sometimes lead, even in his pages, to undue self-analysis or to a heightened idea of one's own philosophical insight; and perhaps tend, by their lack of ideality, to ultimate materialism, or at least to a limited and earthly philosophy. But Dr. Porter is himself highly and truly theistic and spiritual, as most of the Scotch thinkers have been, within their somewhat narrow sphere; but certain of his—and their—postulates are not to be followed too far, without detriment to the cause they seek to serve. The leaders may be devout, may mingle theology and philosophy so that they seem one ; but, in very truth, there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in the "common-sense" philosophy. To be, to do, and to see, and to note one's being, doing, and seeing, does not necessarily involve a knowledge of the philosophy of existence. But Dr. Porter recognizes that many—indeed, the highest—things are learned by self-evident intuitions : and that, as far as externals go, the existence of caused things demands the existence and eternal work of a First Cause. Scotch "common-sense" was invented as an antidote to mere materialistic thinking ; the "common-sense" of Reid, or the "regulative faculty" of Hamilton, meant the power of the mind to arrange and assign its ideas, toward high relations and causes. Porter's "intuition," like Trendelenburg's, goes much farther than this, in the Kantian direction ; and his doctrine of Final Causes, declaring the notion of design to be strictly a priori, is almost thoroughly idealistic.

It is a debatable question whether the name of President McCosh of Princeton ought to be assigned to American literature or to British. He was fifty-seven years of age when he came to the United States, and his reputation was well established. A native of Scotland, and influenced by the tone of his old universities at Edinburgh and Glasgow, he naturally became an exponent of Scotch philosophy. Sir William Hamilton directly and personally influenced him, and his first book, "The Methods of the Divine

McCosh,

Government, Physical and Moral," extended the Hamiltonian principles to the domain of theology, in the religio-philosophical way so familiar in Great Britain and America, where philosophy is chiefly studied and taught by ministers. McCosh's "Intuitions of the Mind Inductively Investigated"; his elaborate examination of John Stuart Mill's philosophy; his "Christianity and Positivism"; his "Laws of Discursive Thought," and his thorough review and restatement of "The Scottish Philosophy" (biographical, expository, and critical, from Hutcheson to Hamilton), show his vigor of mind and ability of utterance. He defends the Scottish philosophy, and attacks its opponents, in active controversial fashion, in large books like the above, in series of pamphlets, and in special addresses or review articles. His work has been that of an earnest defender of a general philosophical system, after the days of its greatest popularity, and in a new land. In certain particulars, as in remanding the question of evolution to the scientists, instead of trying, like Seelye, to refute it by philosophical methods, McCosh has been individual. That the fundamental truths of religion and the basal principles of philosophy are to be affected by purely physical investigations, he strenuously and effectively denies. While criticising Kant and other philosophers on comparatively minor points, his heaviest blows are reserved for Mill and Spencer, whom he attacks both on philosophical grounds and on religious. But times and men change: McCosh has lived to see Spencer deemed a reactionary and conservative by Frederic Harrison, the leading English positivist ; while John Fiske, the foremost American Spencerian, has applied, as we shall see, Spencerianism and Darwinism to the defence of theism and personal immortality.

Philosophical study in America had so far progressed, in 1867, as to lead to the establishment of a Journal of Speculative Philosophy, which has since been continuously published. Its first and William Torrey Harris, b. 1835. only editor has been William T. Harris, formerly school superintendent in St. Louis, and afterwards a resident of Concord, Massachusetts, and an active supporter of the Emersonian summer school of philosophy, in that town. The periodical has for its motto these words of Novalis : " Philosophy can bake no bread, but she can procure for us God, freedom, and immortality," and it has fairly exemplified the ground-principle thus laid down. Its philosophic range has been wide, and contributors of diverse schools of thought have been admitted. Besides purely mental questions, it has discussed related topics, such as the physiological concomitants of thought, and has entered into speculative investigations of the properties of matter. It has deeply studied music and painting. It has endeavored to turn American thought from a too exclusive reverence for the old Scotch standards, or for Comte, Spencer, and Mill, to more spiritual thinkers, such as Plato, Hegel, or Schelling. The aim of its editor has been not only to afford American philosophers a medium for communication, but also to develop American thought and to make it more universal, less provincial. "After all," says Dr. Harris, "it is not 'American thought' so much as American thinkers that we want. To think in the highest sense is to transcend all natural limits—such, for example, as national peculiarities, defects in culture, distinctions in race, habits, and modes of living,—to be universal, so that one can dissolve away the external hull and seize the substance itself. The peculiarities stand in the way; were it not for these we should find Greek or German philosophy just the forms we ourselves need. Our province as Americans is to rise to purer forms than have hitherto been attained, and thus speak a 'solvent word' of more potency than those already uttered. If this be the goal we aim at, it is evident that we can find no other means so well adapted to rid us of our own idiosyncrasies as the study of the greatest thinkers of all ages and all times."

In this line has been the chief service of The Journal of Speculative Philosophy. Most of its contributors have not been men or women of eminence; the merit of its articles has varied greatly; and its range has been so broad as to make one wonder, occasionally, what is its principle of inclusion and exclusion. It seems like a cross between a German philosophical-seminary report and the old Dial of the Transcendentalists of 1840. But it has deepened and broadened American thought, it has incidentally aided literary and æsthetic criticism, and it has aided in the increasingly successful attack on materialistic or utilitarian systems, which, one might have feared, would become more influential in America than they ever have done. It has maintained that the "essentials of human nature," the "nature of first principles" in the world, are soluble. It has, it thinks, found and demonstrated God, freedom, immortality, as mentioned in its Novalis motto. To quote once more the confident words of its editor :

A sacred college of agnostics that should undertake to place on its Index Prohibitory any or all questions relating to God, freedom, or immortality, must base its action either on the fact that its limited investigation has hitherto been unsuccessful in finding a solution, or on the fact that its investigation has discovered necessary limits in the nature of human knowledge. The mere fact of such a want of success on the part of the agnostic does not justify him in pronouncing any thing either unknown or unknowable. It warrants only the modest attitude of the sceptic who affirms his own present ignorance. What man has a right to affirm besides his own ignorance the ignorance of all men? An affirmation of necessary ignorance is still more unwarranted. Modern agnosticism rests chiefly on metaphysical grounds which profess to have discovered the inherent incommensurableness of the infinite or absolute with human capacity for cognition. Such discovery implies acquirements in ontology, a knowledge of the nature of the infinite and absolute, for purposes of comparison, that are utterly destructive of the agnostic hypothesis. The worst possible basis for agnosticism is the metaphysical one. But if the metaphysical basis is removed, there is left only the simple individual fact that such and such gentlemen have not succeeded thus far with the efforts that they have chosen to make in reaching certitude regarding freedom, immortality, etc.

To individual cases of doubt and uncertainty it is possible to oppose other individual cases of knowledge and certainty. Doubt and knowledge, however, are alike unproductive to the one who does not investigate the occasion of the doubt or verify the supposed knowledge for himself.

It is too soon to estimate critically, or with any attempt at final judgment, the writings of ^{John Fiske,} John Fiske, a man whose maturest work, ^{b. 1842.} perhaps, yet remains to be done. But notwithstanding the undesirableness of the discussion, in these pages, of many names like his own, our record of the short and comparatively unimportant list of American philosophical writings would be incomplete without a glance, if no more, at two or three of Fiske's books. His lectures on American history, his studies in folk-lore, his writings on Darwinism, education, and miscellaneous topics, may well be passed by, to be estimated more accurately in future years. But the trend of his distinctly philosophical work, which includes careful consideration of much-discussed contemporary writing in physics, physiology, and ethnology, is such as to call for notice here. Fiske is the chief American Spencerian. His two-volume work called "Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy" presents Herbert Spencer's system, in its nature and tendency, with a fulness and clearness hardly to be matched, so far as the reader's convenience is concerned, in the more elaborate writings of Spencer himself. It also contains much original matter, which, in the departments of psychology and sociology, partly anticipated some of Spencer's later work. Fiske followed Spencer in vigorous destructive criticism of the "Positive Philosophy," that preposterous compound of atheism and Romanism. Indeed, he claims that, by Spencer and his fellow-workers, "a system of philosophy has been constructed, out of purely scientific materials and by the employment of scientific methods, which opposes a direct negative to every one of the theorems of which Positivism is made up." Again: "Mr. Spencer's philosophy is . . . a system which, without making appeal to data that are ontological or to agencies that are extra-cosmic, brings all known truths concerning the coexistence and succession of phenomena into relation with one another as the corollaries of a single primordial truth, which is alleged of the omnipresent Existence (ignored by Positivism) whereof the phenomenal world is the multiform manifestation."

These utterances are in the preface to "Cosmic Philosophy,"—utterances followed by such similar statements as: "The hostility between Science and Religion, about which so much is talked and written, is purely a chimera of imagination. Putting the case into other language, it may be said that to assert a radical hostility between our Knowledge and our Aspirations, is to postulate such a fundamental viciousness in the constitution of things, as the evolutionist, at least, is in no wise bound to acknowledge. . . . That Faith which makes the innermost essence of religion is indestructible. Were it not for the steadfast conviction that this is so, what could sustain us in dealing with questions so mighty and so awful that one is sometimes fain to shrink from facing their full import, lest the mind be overwhelmed and forever paralyzed by the sense of its own nothingness."

Mr. Fiske wrote thus in 1874, and the several chapters of his work elaborated these positions, among many others. In 1884 and 1885 appeared the two other books to be mentioned here: "The Destiny of Man, Viewed in the Light of his Origin"; and "The Idea of God as Affected by Modern Knowledge." In the former the author applied the evolutionist's arguments, in which he implicitly believes, to the proof of personal immortality. The book was first delivered as lectures in that curious heterogeneous compound of wisdom and eccentricity, the Concord Summer School of Philosophy. The argument is: that man is and must remain the highest product of evolution on earth; that the brain and its powers were evolved preponderatingly; and that with the increased strength of the brain came spirituality and morals, to gain until "peace and love shall reign supreme. The dream of poets, the lesson of priest and prophet, the inspiration of the great musician, is confirmed in the light of modern knowledge. And as we gird ourselves up for the work of life, we may look forward to the time when in the truest sense the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever, King of kings and Lord of lords." In the latter book Mr. Fiske follows the line of discussion further, and applies it to questions of theism in general, and the regulation of the universe. He rejects the Augustinian, Calvinistic, or other united and accurately-defined doctrines of God's existence, and finds that the immanence of the Great Cause is like the Force of the physicists. The mind of man, with its developed moral nature, mirrors and leads to the vastly different but similar mind of God, of which it is a type. Evolution and destiny, as viewed by Mr. Fiske, are the real thing of which foreordination and a scheme of salvation were imperfect definitions.

Since 1870 or 1880, in America, there has been a marked increase of strength of theistic and spiritual belief and argument, among scientific men, students of philosophy, religious "radicals," and others. It is true that "orthodoxy" or "evangelicalism" has not included any increased number of high intellects within its pale. Contemporary American literature and thought is, to a considerable extent, outside of the limits of the Trinitarian bodies, and not to be accounted orthodox by Roman Catholic, "High Church," Calvinistic, or "Reformed" standards. It is not hostile to Christianity; to the principles of its Founder it is, for the most part, sincerely attached; it complains of no priestcraft, which, in America, has so little power over the best mind that it is not even, as in France to Victor Hugo, an aggravation; it complains now of no overbearing clerical conservatism, it simply lets modern denominations do their work, accepting what is good and permanent, and ignoring what it deems transient. But, on the other hand, materialism has scarcely any hold upon it. Not one American book of the first class has ever been written by an atheist or denier of immortality. The very poet accepted as the incarnation of extreme "Americanism"—Walt Whitman—accepts both theism and the doctrine of the future life. The detail-maps of heaven and hell, once owned by the popes and the Mathers, have become antiquated, and the pass-words are half-forgotten, but American thought remains loyal to "God, freedom, and immortality."

CHAPTER IX.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

IN the strictest estimate of the amount and value of the intellectual product of America, the work of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 1803-1882. Ralph Waldo Emerson is entitled to thorough and respectful consideration. Who was the man, and what did he do? What was the purpose, and what the achievement, of the spoken and written words by which his message was given to the world?

Emerson was a descendant of a long line of New England ministers, representing the stern democratic aristocracy of Massachusetts—an aristocracy dependent only upon brain and achievement, and upon the respect bestowed upon the minister in the Congregational churches. “Come ye out from among them, and be ye separate” was the command heeded by the English Puritans and Independents in the seventeenth century, as against the supporters of prelacy and kingcraft. The same non-conformist pulse beat in the veins of Emerson, under new skies and in new days. The founders of New England were Protestants and Independents; they protested against assumptions unwarranted, as they believed, by Scripture, and they were independent of those who assumed to control their theocratic commonwealth. Emerson, in the nineteenth century, protested against conventionality and sham in the churches, in society, and in the State; and he stood independent of public sentiment and the domination of the majority. He was a reformer among reformers; he spoke his word and wrote his line, content to bide his time and let the utterance find its hearer or reader. Condemned and hated by many, he lived in the serenest optimism. His method was that of the seer, rather than that of the inductive philosopher; he outspoke, and left the result with others. Measured by the standards of "orthodoxy," whether Roman, Episcopal, Presbyterian, or old-time Congregational, he was a heretic and a destroyer. But in the great age-conflict between materialism and idealism, he was an idealist through and through. He fought no battles for prelacy, for the Westminster Confession, or the Trinity; but as against atheism, pessimism, and utilitarianism, he was an ally of Christianity. Inwardly, what was his philosophy? Hear it concisely stated in his own words to his friend Carlyle: "My whole philosophy, which is Emerson's philosophy. very real, teaches acquiescence and optimism." What were his aim and his success in outward teaching? To impart and to make sacred the idea of intellectual independence.

The downfall of the classical school in English poetry, which so deeply influenced the literature of the world, was but a single element in a great change which affected many nations. From Pope to Wordsworth, from Thomson to Shelley, the English mind suffered many and significant modifications. Realism, naturalism, simplicity, and romanticism succeeded artificiality, preciseness, and classicism in spirit and form. The most powerful influence, however, that made English literature between 1800 and 1825 more commanding than English literature between 1750 and 1775, was the new interest in Man in the Universe, his origin, character, possibilities, and ultimate destiny. This interest was felt in many lands besides the British isles. In Germany the force exerted by Goethe powerfully affected all his contemporaries, and more than any thing else gave German literature that high position which it had shamefully lacked for so long. The mind of new Germany was studied in England by Coleridge and some of the less insular scholars; and Goethe, in particular, impressed upon Carlyle those characteristics which had moulded so many of Goethe's own countrymen. Richter's influence upon Carlyle was also marked; and Sterne had in some ways influenced Richter. Of Carlyle's originality and native force there can be no question, but he absorbed and utilized German thought in such ways as to make it useful to his English and Scotch fellows—to many of whom it came as a revelation.

Between Carlyle and Emerson there were, as we shall see, many and grave differences; it is as idle to call Emerson a "follower" of Carlyle as to call Carlyle a disciple of Emerson. But the work done by Emerson in America was decidedly similar to that of Carlyle in Edinburgh, Oxford, and London. Emancipation and freedom were less needed in America than in Germany, Scotland, or England. Political freedom had been attained here; social and intellectual bans were less forbidding on the western shore of the Atlantic than on the eastern. As for a "classical" school in literature, we had scarcely any literature at all when Emerson began to write, certainly none from whose shackles we needed to be set free. Nevertheless, the freer thought of the nineteenth century had a mission for the western republic itself. American society was English society, existing under different conditions, but not different in its essential nature. Our colleges were founded upon the Oxford plan, and our prevalent religious attitude was one which would now be called thoroughly conservative. Notwithstanding the intellectual freedom which had so powerfully worked on political lines, the breath of modern thought had not thoroughly been felt. The isolation of the United States postponed the effect of that newer renaissance which, at the beginning of the century, influenced England so profoundly. America had stimulated Europe at the close of the eighteenth century, first politically, then otherwise; now she was beginning to feel the effects of European currents. German transcendentalism or spiritualism in philosophy first touched the American mind through the writings of Coleridge, who had several earnest students on the western side of the Atlantic. After Coleridge came Emerson, by a natural succession; and side by side with Emerson—not in advance of him—there stood for American readers Carlyle, who, though not a transcendentalist, was an idealist, a worker for righteousness, a poet. Carlyle thundered as a prophet of evil, a denouncer of wrong, a summoner to good; the force of man's will was the force on which he relied for reform; his very prejudices were intense and influential. Emerson thought upon, and revealed to his countrymen, the good; he was an optimist, a serene presence, unexcited because confident of the ultimate result. Carlyle made terrible mistakes, and showed the injustice of ignorance. Emerson, though bitterly attacked, seldom retorted and seldom swerved from his self-confident course. To the essayist of Chelsea God was a mighty avenging and rewarding force; to the essayist of Concord he was a benign spirit pervading the universe. "Thou shalt," "thou shalt not," said Carlyle; "be thyself," said Emerson.

The life of Ralph Waldo Emerson was outwardly an uneventful one. The literary man of the nineteenth century lives in no such events as those which followed Chaucer, Spenser, Marlowe, Bacon, Milton, Bunyan, or De Foe. The placid academic career of Gray was scarcely more quiet than the lives of Wordsworth in England or Emerson or Longfellow in America. The man Emerson, outside of his books and lectures, was simply a silent citizen of the country town of Concord, in which he was a successful farmer. Most of the male ancestors of Emerson, in the direct line, were Congregational ministers in the eastern part of Massachusetts, and one of his forefathers, by an early maternal line, was Rev. Peter Bulkley, the first minister of that town of Concord with which Emerson's fame was so closely connected. This clerical ancestry, upon which Emerson somewhat prided himself, and upon which all of his biographers dwell fondly, was not a surprising thing. The Emersons were well educated, and duly sent their sons to college. The ministerial profession was the one to which college graduates naturally turned. Forty or fifty per cent. of Harvard's alumni became ministers in the old days. The clerical line preceding the essayist and poet means simply, in this instance, that he came from the best New England stock, accustomed for years to think and live in an atmosphere stimulating to thought. It would be an error to suppose that those nearest to Emerson in the line of descent were old-fashioned Puritans. The change in theological opinion which finally brought the Unitarian revival of 1800-1820 had begun in Eastern Massachusetts by the middle of the eighteenth century. Emerson's grandmother married, as her second husband, Rev. Dr. Ezra Ripley, senior minister of the Concord church after the Unitarian change; and Rev. William Emerson, father of Ralph Waldo, was minister of the First Church in Boston until his death in 1811. The First Church was historically the most prominent religious organization in the town, and William Emerson seems to have had that grace of manner and quiet eloquence which afterward appeared in his son. In his time he was deemed a radical, but a tolerant one; a good man, but not a very able or vigorous one. His wife was Ruth Haskins, of Boston, a woman of whom many kind things are said, and who may be described as a New England mother. The "hereditary genius" of Emerson, like that of Longfellow, Holmes, or Lowell, simply promised that he would be an intelligent man, somewhat better educated and somewhat more liberal than his predecessors, and a New Englander in mental habit. That which was to come afterward must depend upon individual taste and effort.

Emerson was born almost at the beginning of the century, in Boston, May 25, 1803, during his father's pastorate over the First Church. At that time, and during the period of Emerson's school and college days, literature in Boston was springing into leaf and flower. After theological productiveness lessened in Massachusetts, miscellaneous literature, such as it was, flourished more vigorously in Connecticut, New York, and Pennsylvania than on Massachusetts Bay; but no long time elapsed before the Bostonians took up their pens with a new and more distinctly literary purpose. The Unitarian ministers were paying considerable attention to the art of style, and a culture which was to be described by no more complimentary epithet than "genial," was slowly developing in the society of the town, and of the neighboring Cambridge. Finally appeared The Monthly Anthology, which was something better than a college literary magazine. Rev. William Emerson edited it for a time, and gathered into its pages whatever literary ability he could summon to his aid. The Boston Athenæum's library and art collection were also begun; Boston gentlemen were beginning to meet in societies and elsewhere, and were striving, in several ways, to promote literature and culture. In all these other movements William Emerson took an active part. By the time Ralph Waldo Emerson graduated at Harvard, he had heard Daniel Webster plead, and Channing preach, studied Greek under Edward Everett and modern languages under George Ticknor, and read The North American Review (virtually the improved ^{Emerson's} _{youth.} successor of The Monthly Anthology) for several years. In college he was a great reader, and an occasional writer in prose and verse. Some of his college companions—William Henry Furness, George Ripley, Charles Wentworth Upham—felt the same new stimulus at Harvard, under the English instruction of Edward Tyrrel Channing, and afterward attained some note as writers. Ripley and Furness, too, were to become “reformers” in the approaching days of religio-philosophical simmer. Elsewhere, Bryant, the elder Dana, Washington Allston, Charles Sprague, Joseph Rodman Drake, Fitz-Greene Halleck, James Gates Percival, and Irving were beginning to be known; clearly the dawn had come, but there was no precursor of Emerson.

Emerson had left his family in narrow circumstances, Ralph Waldo Emerson, following the clerical bent of his inherited genius, and Emerson the minister. turning to the profession which was still the most tempting field for a New England mind, studied at the Cambridge divinity school, and entered the Unitarian ministry. At that time Unitarianism, though held in abhorrence in other parts of the country, was socially and intellectually paramount in the vicinity of Boston. The theology of Channing was prevalent. Emerson, though he began to study under Channing's supervision, was even in youth somewhat inclined to radicalism; but even as a radical he was not an early force, for neither his collegiate nor his theological studies gave special promise of future distinction. His first clerical opportunity, after finishing his work as a divinity student, was a very favorable one. In 1829, when a little less than twenty-six years old, he was ordained and installed as colleague pastor of the old Second Church in Boston, of which the senior pastor was the elder Henry Ware. Before long, by Dr. Ware's resignation, young Emerson became sole minister of one of the more prominent churches of the New England metropolis. His four years' career as a Boston preacher appears to have been fairly successful, but not brilliant. He was an anti-slavery reformer, was interested in the school affairs of Boston, and served for a time as chaplain to the State Senate. During this pastorate he was married, and his wife died. In 1832 occurred that event which ended Emerson's ministerial life, made him notorious among the churches, and redounds little to his credit, on any theory. On Sunday, September 9, 1832, after much deliberation, and after conference with the church leaders, he preached a sermon in which he declared his opinion that the Lord's Supper was never intended to be a permanent rite; that the Primitive Church made some mistakes; that "the use of the elements, however suitable to the people and the modes of thought in the East, where it originated, is foreign and unsuited to affect us"; that Christ himself cared nothing for forms, and we ought not to insist on a formal commemoration of his work; and that, in short, "the day of formal religion is past." He went on to state that he had "no hostility to this institution," did not wish to obtrude his own opinion, and would rejoice in all the good it might produce, but could not longer administer the communion. Therefore, as the church thought the celebration of the communion part of a minister's duty, he resigned.

This act of Mr. Emerson's has been magnified by some of his admirers into an example of the greatest heroism, which others ought to follow. That Emerson was honest in it there is no reason to doubt; but that he was a hero or a martyr does not follow. When a Christian minister cannot observe a simple and mandatory form of the religion established by the founder of Christianity, it is quite time for him to withdraw. Every intelligent person will now admit that "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life"; that Christianity was designed to be a nonritualistic religion of the soul, and that it may exist in its spiritual purity, as among the Friends, even without those few external things which Christ commanded. But every one also knows that the communion service, rightly observed, has no injurious ritualistic effect, but is high and helpful in the religious life. If Emerson thought Christ merely a man, why could he not eat bread and drink wine in affectionate remembrance of the body broken and the blood spilt for humanity? But it is enough to say that this affair had little injurious effect upon the Unitarian churches, simply terminating a pastorate of no more than average success, and turning Emerson to the life-work for which he was best fitted, that of literature.

In 1833 he took a preliminary European tour, meeting a few celebrities, including Carlyle. The journey broadened his view and stored his mind, but bore no immediate fruit. On his return, not yet wholly abandoning the ministerial profession, he preached here and there, sometimes for months in succession, but his views on the communion service hindered any new settlement, if he desired one. In 1834 he took up his home in Concord, where he dwelt until his death.

This choice of a residence on Emerson's part was the thing which made Concord a sort of literary Mecca; for the "Concord school" of American writers, of course, looked to Emerson as its head. Nearly all of the lesser authors who have lived in Concord, from 1834 to the days of the summer meetings of the Concord School of Philosophy, have gone thither not by accident nor for any other reason than the desire to be near the great essayist, and to be ranked among kindred thinkers. Hawthorne's periods of residence in Concord had nothing to do with Emerson's choice of home, and Thoreau was a native of the town ; these two must be excepted. The village is a pretty one, and the surroundings are as attractive as those of an average town in New England, though the summer season visits Concord with unusual fervor. Concord and Cambridge are the two Massachusetts towns which have drawn authors to them by the force of associations, but Cambridge is the seat of a college only three miles from Boston, while Concord is still a farming community. Emerson, therefore, alone among American authors, has been a philosopher who has drawn learners to his didactic groves. Hawthorne, during his Concord years, stood intellectually aloof from Emerson, to whom he owed nothing in particular ; Thoreau, though patronized by Emerson, was an original genius ; nearly all the others looked up to Emerson with reverential and discipular awe. Some of them have gone farther than their master, who, though sometimes eccentric, was never amusing ; but all together have made Transcendentalism a force, and on the whole a decidedly beneficent force, in American thought and life.

Transcendentalism in America (as following the Coleridgean spiritualism) may be said to have begun with Emerson's appearance in the lecture field, in 1834. What was Transcendentalism? It was the reaction from the utilitarianism of Jeremy Bentham ; Transcendentalism. from any philosophic or materialistic doctrine which denied that the soul was self-centred. Transcendentalism averred that man knew some things not derived from cold external experience, and not connected with practical or physical advantage. Its theory of thought, and morals, and action had to do with intuitive ideas, as well as with practical acquisitions ; it was thoroughly and highly idealistic. The transcendentalism of Coleridge and the transcendentalism of Emerson and the Concord writers were closely like Dr. Channing's theory of the supreme authority of conscience, and they also resembled the Friends' great doctrine of the inner light. There was, of course, nothing absolutely new in the Coleridgean and Emersonian revivals, or in the great German influence which, through Carlyle, was making such havoc with the cold and selfish part of English philosophy. Most men are idealists ; the greatest thinkers of all ages have recognized the might of conscience ; and all the true poets of the world have seen more in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in philosophy. But ideal truth, sublime and eternal, accepted by the thought of all ages, and of the very essence of Christianity, was in need of re-statement. A materialistic period had passed, in France, in a part of England, and in a part of the United States ; and another such period was to come. Against materialism Emerson preached a spiritual, self-centred idealism. But still another element was present in all that he taught. It was the element of reverential communion with nature, and with the Spirit from which nature came, and under which it works. At its worst and vaguest, this spirit of Transcendentalism was akin to a loose and profitless pantheism; at its best it was a helper of the highest and truest thing in humanity, its spiritual part. Emerson was the natural follower of Goethe and Carlyle, but not less of Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Shelley. But his ethics were loftier than Goethe's; in him Carlyle's force-doctrine did not exist; and though he was less technically philosophic than Coleridge, he had a stronger power of putting philosophy into a tangible and rememberable form. His kinship with Wordsworth and Shelley was at first sight slighter; but he must be a careless reader who does not see that Wordsworth's ideas of nature as reflecting man's moods and helping his destiny are existent in Emerson, especially in his poems; and that the thought of Shelley's "Hymn to the Spirit of Nature" is an undertone, more clearly heard by the average ear, of nearly all that Emerson wrote. If Carlyle's idea of Providence was masculine and personal, Emerson's was gentler, and more impressed with the thought of the union between the "Over-Soul"—the immanent Divinity—and whatever is good in man. But as compared with Shelley's sincere and vague pantheism, the devotion and individualism of Emerson have a far more practical result. Emerson's Transcendentalism does not lose sight of the active work of the world; indeed, its whole mission is as intensely practical and personal as the mission of Carlyle's chapter called "The Everlasting Yea," or Longfellow's "Psalm of Life."

The influences which, in Emerson's own view, were effective in the revival of thought and literature at this time were Swedenborgianism ; the importation of German thought by young educated Americans ; the development of the sciences of astronomy and geology ; phrenology ; the critical tendency, promoted by the Harvard Unitarian theologians and Dr. Channing ; and the writings of Goethe. This mixture illustrates the unsettled state of things at the beginning of Emerson's career ; for surely

A time of change.

Swedenborgianism and phrenology made no mark now visible upon American literature. But strong and on the whole beneficent forces were at work in that period of ites and isms, in which, as described by Emerson, the " Friends of Universal Progress " would hold conventions composed of " madmen, madwomen, men with beards, Dunkers, Muggletonians, Come-outers, Groaners, Agrarians, Seventh-day Baptists, Quakers, Abolitionists, Calvinists, Unitarians, and philosophers." Yet in these very meetings, thus quaintly variegated, were such men as Channing, Alcott, Parker, Garrison, and Jones Very ; while in the first meeting of the Transcendental Club were Emerson, Alcott, Ripley, Hedge, and Freeman Clarke. " The peculiarity of all this period," says Emerson, " was its return to law, to what was normal, natural, and human." And the subjects of Emerson's first lectures were from the normal, the natural, and the human, for example : The Relation of Man to the Globe ; Luther ; Burke ; Fox ; Milton ; Michael Angelo. In these lectures he outlined or asserted those doctrines concerning man, character, duty, life, nature, beauty, which were to be reasserted in so many subsequent lectures ; essays, and poems. To Emerson, man was a being of godlike essence, bound to be erect, noble, independent, worthy of himself ; character was the elaboration of the germs of the best things in the soul : duty was the acceptance and utilization of one's environment ; life was an august possibility and a high obligation ; nature was the mirror of deity ; and beauty—

“ Tell, them, dear, if eyes were made for seeing,
Then beauty is its own excuse for being.”

Emerson had now fairly entered upon his literary career. He was lecturing in Boston every winter, on literature, history, or culture ; he delivered a historical address at the two hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of the town of Concord ; and he was still preaching regularly at the little Unitarian church in the neighboring village of East Lexington. He had begun his life-long correspondence with Thomas Carlyle, whose first book he introduced to American readers before its English appearance ; and, best of all, he had begun to write those poems which are among the choicest achievements of American literature, and which we shall study at length in the second volume of this work. He was also known in the literary, philosophical, and “ advanced ” religious circles of eastern Massachusetts as an able, if somewhat eccentric, thinker. As yet, however, he could not be said to be widely known. Nor did great or wide reputation come at once with the publication, in 1836, of that remarkable booklet, "Nature," containing a single essay on Nature, which ^{1836.} we instinctively regard as the corner-stone of Emerson's fame. The sale of the book was small and slow; it was published anonymously; but its readers, wherever the "fit though few" were found, did not forget it. Ralph Waldo Emerson was henceforth to be a power in the movements of American thought.

This essay contains much that is beautiful in form and true in inner thought, as far as mere description goes. It is a prose-poem, not free from eccentricities or apparent obscurities. But let us not delay a moment to discuss its superficial qualities. It had a lofty purpose, a mission. Its utterances were an explicit statement of a creed denied alike by the Calvinist and the materialist. The world is lost, and under the wrath of God, says the Calvinist. The world is self-created, purposeless, and to be made the most of before we perish forever, says the materialist. Hear Emerson: "Every natural fact is a symbol of some spiritual fact." "All things are normal, and in their boundless changes have an increasing reference to spiritual nature. Every animal function, from the sponge up to Hercules, shall hint or thunder to man the laws of right and wrong, and echo the ten commandments. This ethical character so penetrates the bone and marrow of nature, as to secure the end for which it was made. Every natural process is a version of a moral sentence. The moral law lies at the centre of nature and radiates to the circumference." "Truth and goodness and beauty are but different faces of the same All. But beauty in Nature is not ultimate. It is the herald of inward and eternal beauty." "When we come to inquire Whence is matter? and Whereto? many truths arise to us out of the recesses of consciousness. We learn that the highest is present to the soul of man, that the dread universal essence, which is not wisdom, or love, or beauty, or power, but all in one, and each entirely, is that for which all things exist, and that by which they are; that spirit creates; that behind nature, throughout nature, spirit is present; that spirit is one and not compound; that spirit does not act upon us from without, that is, in space and time, but spiritually, or through ourselves; therefore that spirit, that is, the Supreme Being, does not build up nature around us, but puts it forth through us as the life of the tree puts forth new branches and leaves through the pores of the old." "Man is conscious of a universal soul within or behind his individual life, wherein, as in a firmament, the natures of justice, truth, love, freedom, arise and shine." "The foundations of man are not in matter, but in spirit; but the element of spirit is eternity." -

And all this has a practical application to the upbuilding of the character of the individual man: "Know, then, that the world exists for you. For you is the phenomenon perfect. What we are that only can we see. All that Adam had, all that Cæsar could, you have and can do. Adam called his house heaven and earth, Cæsar called his house Rome; you, perhaps, call yours a cobbler's trade, a hundred acres of ploughed land, or a scholar's gar-ret. Yet, line for line and point for point, your dominion is as great as theirs, though without fine names. Build, therefore, your own world. As fast as you conform your life to the pure idea in your mind, that will unfold its great proportions."

Here, then, we have Emerson's philosophy of nature, life, and development. It is profoundly ethical, ever in search of the purpose of things, optimistic, reliant upon God, strenuous for the development of the individual. It is an Anglo-Saxon Emerson's Anglo-Saxon philosophy, not a Greek, Roman, or Gallic philosophy. No fondness for Orientalism in Emerson, no eccentricity or obscurity, no inconsistency—and all these are found in his books,—ever swerved him from this fundamental idea of man's place in the universe.

On the last day of August, 1837, the year after the publication of "Nature," Emerson delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Harvard an oration entitled "The American Scholar." The book had made some stir among a few thoughtful readers; the address quickened and excited many scholarly hearers. Emerson felt that the opportunity was one in which he could make a general statement of his intellectual creed, and of the principles which, in his view, should animate the thought and brain-work of America. "Let us be Americans, take new guides, and explore the present." "As the source of truth is not books, but mental activity, we are to cultivate self-trust. Help can come to us only from our own bosoms, and in ourselves we find the law of all nature, so that the world is nothing. We are to be units, walk on our own feet, think our own thoughts, and speak our own minds." "Our day of dependence, our long apprenticeship to the learning of other lands, draws to a close. The millions that around us are rushing into life cannot always be fed on the sere remains of foreign harvests." "No age should humbly follow the books or intellectual customs of the preceding age; one's own view of duty should not be shadowed by other men's views." "Meek young men grow up in libraries, believing it their duty to accept the views which Cicero, which Locke, which Bacon, have given, forgetful that Cicero, Locke, and Bacon were only young men in libraries when they wrote these books." "Genius looks forward; the eyes of man are set in his forehead, not in his hindhead; man hopes, genius creates." "Man thinking" was Emerson's definition of the scholar, and by this he meant the whole man, not the narrow specialist—a ninth part of man—already beginning to appear. "The state of society is one in which the members have suffered amputation from the trunk, and strut about so many walking monsters—a good finger, a neck, a stomach, an elbow, but never a man." Finally, "in self-trust all the virtues are comprehended. Free should the scholar be—free and brave. Free even to the definition of freedom, without any hindrance that does not arise out of his own constitution. Brave, for fear is a thing which a scholar, by his very function, puts behind him." This address, true and clear—as the so-called obscurity of the "Nature" essay was clear to the responsive mind—was, in the words of James Russell Lowell (quoted in Holmes' "Life of Emerson," from Lowell's essay on Emerson), "an event without any former parallel in our literary annals, a scene to be always treasured in the memory for its picturesqueness and its inspiration. What crowded and breathless aisles, what windows clustering with eager heads, what enthusiasm of approval, what grim silence of foregone dissent!" Lowell was then a college senior, and surely caught some of Emerson's inspiration for his early life-work. So has many another who has read the spoken words on the printed page. Dr. Holmes quotes this statement: "A nation of men will for the first time exist, because each believes himself inspired by the Divine Soul which also inspires all men," and adds: "This grand oration was our intellectual Declaration of Independence. Nothing like it had been heard in the halls of Harvard since Samuel Adams supported the affirmative of the question; 'Whether it be lawful to resist the chief magistrate if the commonwealth cannot otherwise be preserved.' . . . The young men went out from it as if a prophet had been proclaiming to them: 'Thus saith the Lord!'"*

From a literary point of view, the address which Emerson delivered the next year (July, 1838) at the Harvard Divinity School was inferior to "Nature" or "The American Scholar," but it aroused an intenser theological controversy

than that evoked by Emerson's sermon on the communion service. The undertone of this famous address may be found in these nine words, which were spoken in it: "The moral sentiment is the essence of all religion." This statement seems a mere truism, but Emerson's hearers were hardly pleased to hear him add that, in his view, historical Christianity had become corrupted; that the authority of the individual conscience had been overridden by creeds, forms, and an undue devotion to the person of Jesus, of whom he said: "Jesus Christ belonged to the true race of prophets; he saw with open eye the mystery of the soul; alone in all history he estimated the greatness of man;"—and that it was a great mistake to speak of Revelation as a past and finished thing. "The stationariness of religion, the assumption that the age of inspiration is passed, that the Bible is closed, the fear of degrading the character of Jesus by representing him as a man, indicate with sufficient clearness the falsehood of our theology. It is," exclaimed Emerson, "the office of a true teacher to show that God is, not was; that he speaketh, not spake." This insistence on the supremacy of one's individual moral nature, this belief in the immanence of Deity, were nothing new with Emerson, and are accepted, in some sense, by Protestantism everywhere, but they were so stated as to alarm most of Emerson's hearers, Unitarians included. It was thought that he had attempted to dethrone and debase Christianity, and an earnest controversy followed, in which the younger Henry Ware, the head of the Divinity

School, courteously withstood Emerson, emphasizing the need of a personal head in the Christian system, or any other. Emerson's friends have claimed, in reply, that his perception of the mind of Christ proved him not a worse, but a better, follower than most Christians are. But the controversy is as thoroughly forgotten now as the doctrinal debates of Boston and Cambridge two hundred years before. It is enough to say that in this address Emerson applied to general religion the principles he had already stated. In some respects, indeed, and always in his ethical statements, he would seem to rank with the conservatives of today, as when he says: "As we are, so we associate. The good, by affinity, seek the good; the vile, by affinity, the vile. Thus, of their own volition, souls proceed into heaven, into hell."

The remainder of Emerson's literary life was not marked by lectures or publications so significant, and in their results so sensational, as these. Emerson, with a calmness and serenity that characterized all his utterances, however bold or revolutionary, had spoken his thought and uttered his credo; his position was now known to all who cared to note it; thenceforward he had but to go on. In the same month of July, 1838, in which Emerson spoke to the Cambridge divinity students, ^{"Literary Ethics,"} 1838. he addressed the literary societies of Dartmouth College on "Literary Ethics." In this address—one of the best of Emerson's writings—there was nothing to cause any theological or other upheaval; it followed the lines of Emerson's previous utterances concerning the sense of right in the heart, the imperative and not-to-be-disobeyed idea of duty, and the scholar's bounden privilege of high intellectual independence and confidence in one's self. The speaker urgently bade his young hearers be true to their best hopes, nor bend to any low materialism of the age: "You will hear that the first duty is to get land and money, place and name. 'What is this truth you seek? What is this beauty?' men will ask, with derision. If, nevertheless, God have called any of you to explore truth and beauty, be bold, be firm, be true. When you shall say: 'As others do, so will I; I renounce, I am sorry for it, my early vision; I must eat the good of the land, and let learning and romantic expectations go, until a more convenient season,'—then dies the man in you; then once more perish the buds of art, and poetry, and science, as they have died already in a thousand thousand men. Bend to the persuasion which is flowing to you from every object in nature, to be its tongue to the heart of man, and to show to the besotted world how passing fair is wisdom. Why should you renounce your right to traverse the starlit deserts of truth, for the premature comforts of an acre, house, and barn?"

For the rest of his life Emerson was a lecturer, before college societies, literary bodies, Emerson the lecturer. and country "lyceums." In Boston, winter after winter, he delivered courses of several lectures, and though these addresses were nearly all printed, sooner or later, in his increasing list of volumes, probably as many knew Emerson the solid and felicitous speaker as Emerson the poet and essayist.

It has been a common experience with American authors to serve as editors of periodicals for longer or shorter periods. Lowell, Bryant, Whittier, and Poe were editors at one time or another, and Emerson had a similar experience for a brief period, The Dial, as conductor of The Dial, the Transcendental organ in Boston. The little knot of men and women who were in general sympathy with the Transcendental movement were not, as Emerson explained, inventors of any new thing; they were simply modern idealists; working by the inner light rather than by cold external experience. In Emerson's definition: "The materialist insists on facts, on history, on the force of circumstances, and the animal wants of man; the idealist, on the power of thought and of will, on inspiration, on miracle, on individual culture." And again: "The materialist takes his departure from the external world, and esteems a man as one product of that. The idealist takes his departure from his consciousness, and reckons the world an appearance. His thought, that is the Universe." It will be seen from these quotations alone that the Transcendentalists were deeply and earnestly in the right, and also that their creed gave them ample opportunity to make fools of themselves, as individual members might elect to take some particular departure from their consciousness, and reckon the world an appearance. This opportunity was embraced by some, and The Dial magazine, like the whole Transcendental movement, was a curious compound of the noblest and absurdest ingredients. Emerson himself was a strong and serene mind, apparently eccentric at times, and unfettered by traditions. But he was dominated by sound common-sense, and, like all great radicals and revolutionists, was well aware when the time for cessation and silence had come. A few of his associates shared neither his high ability nor his Yankee shrewdness, and thereby furnished Transcendentalism with certain spectacular and superfluous features which hurt it in the popular mind. As the great anti-slavery movement in the United States was shared by some who wished to abolish not only slavery, but God, religion, marriage, and meat-eating, so in the Transcendental revival there were not lacking a few who, hearing Emerson call their thought the universe, concluded that they were proprietors of the universe.

The Dial, however, was a part of the general American revival of thought, philanthropy, and religion in the early part of the century. Under Emerson's lead it unquestionably helped philanthropy and religion a little, and thought and literature much. After some discussion concerning its name—"The Spiritual Inquirer" and "The Transcendentalist" were titles considered—The Dial appeared in July, 1840, and was issued monthly for nearly four years. Miss Sarah Margaret Fuller (a personage concerning whose real place in American literature there has been much discussion, and whose writings will be considered in a later page), was its first editor, and Emerson was its second. Neither editors nor contributors received any pay, but its pages really rivalled The North American Review, the great Boston periodical before the establishment of The Atlantic Monthly, in the array of names represented. Besides the editors, The Dial boasted among its contributors Henry D. Thoreau, A. Bronson Alcott, James Freeman Clarke, and Ellery Channing the younger. Its successive numbers included many essays and poems by Emerson, of which the essays "The Transcendentalist" and "The Conservative," and the poems "Wood-notes," "The Sphinx," and "The Problem" were the best. On the whole, Emerson and Thoreau were its most valuable writers, as measured by time's test; most of the contributions by others may be left to the mere antiquarian. But it was a prophecy as well as an achievement, a force as well as a result; and it gave young men and women a chance to utter their souls, not previously an easy task, so far as print was concerned, in conservative-radical Boston.

As for the famous Brook-Farm community of 1841-1847, at West Roxbury, Mass., why speak of The Brook-Farm community. it at length? It was somewhat connected with the Transcendental simmer, and may be described as the application of the principles of The Dial to agriculture. Emerson sensibly kept out of it, and Hawthorne withdrew at an early opportunity. The amiable experiment was not in vain, for it left "The Blithedale Romance" as a book in American literature.

In 1841, when Emerson was thirty-eight years old, appeared his first collected volume of essays. In 1878, at the age of seventy-five, he put forth the last volume of his lifetime, a lecture entitled "The Fortune of the Republic." Between these two books, besides his two volumes of Emerson's poetry, appeared the second series of works. the essays; "Nature, Addresses, and Lectures" (first published as Miscellanies); "Representative Men"; "English Traits"; "The Conduct of Life"; "Society and Solitude"; "Letters and Social Aims." Besides these books, many of Emerson's religious, political, or general addresses were issued in separate pamphlets, prior to their inclusion between covers; he introduced to the American public some of Carlyle's earliest ventures; he gave help in the preparation of the memorials of Margaret Fuller, and the manuscripts of Thoreau; he wrote an introduction to the only American edition of Saadi's "Gulistan"; he edited a collection of poetry aptly called "Parnassus," but valuable only as an indication of his own tastes; and he was a frequent contributor to one or two periodicals in Boston. After his death (in 1882, aged 79), two volumes were gathered from periodicals or manuscripts, and issued under the titles of "Miscellanies," and "Lectures and Biographical Sketches." His poems also appeared in an enlarged edition.

The collected edition of Emerson's works comprises eleven volumes, ten in prose. Of these ten volumes, nine may fairly be considered essays; for the personal matter contained in "Representative Men" and in the various biographical sketches is so closely connected with a broad and philosophic view of life that it virtually is not severed from the general body of Emerson's writing. In a limited sense this is true even of the descriptive work entitled "English Traits." Emerson the essayist. Emerson, therefore, was an essayist; in the essay he uttered his thoughts and presented his philosophy. When he lectured, he read his essays, and when he spoke on a personal theme, he connected his theme with his philosophy of life. Even of Carlyle all this could not be said with equal truth. The essays of Bacon are the dicta of a wise man, based on experience. The essays of Montaigne are the thoughts of a brilliant man, spontaneously uttered. The essays of Addison are the editorials or magazine articles of a graceful moralist in a mixed society. The essays of Lamb or Irving have the charm of humor and pathos, and are closely united with the sentiment of humanity. The essays of Emerson, ranging from the hearthstone to the boundless expanse of space and time, utter a philosophy of life, based on observation and also on insight; of large and devout optimism bent toward a practical good. Unlike Bacon, Emerson sought to construct no system, for his nature was that of a seer, not a mathematician. But he was a philosopher. Once more let his words be remembered as a summary of his life-work: "My whole philosophy, which is very real, teaches acquiescence and optimism." Acquiescence, to Emerson, was a reverent making the most of one's self ; optimism was a serene trust which could wait for the developments of an eternity in which, as it profoundly believed, the present played a part. This philosophy runs through his prose and his verse, and is never lost. In its presence the names and titles of his various books seem minor details in a constant work. Few men of letters have written so uniformly, from youth to age. The titles of the chapters in the first collection of essays might serve as a synopsis of all that came after : " History," " Self-Reliance," " Compensation," " Spiritual Laws," " Love," " Friendship," " Prudence," " Heroism," " The Over-Soul," " Circles," " Intellect," " Art."

The literary style in which Emerson wrote was distinctly his own. It was not Bacon's, nor Addison's, nor Macaulay's, nor Carlyle's. It was remarkably free from the antitheses Emerson's style. and balanced forms in which so many preceding essayists had written, and it was also free from pedantry, Latinisms, and mere quotations. Emerson, as a writer, has been compared with that minister who gradually filled a barrel with separately written pages, and picked out enough for a sermon when Sunday came. Again, it has been said that Emerson's essays would read as well backwards as forwards, sentence by sentence. But, on the other hand, few thinkers have given signs of a closer and more unified mental habit, and few, certainly, have been more fruitful in stimulating hearer and reader. Is there any truth in these semi-jocose criticisms ?

Simply this, that Emerson's intellect was characterized by sententiousness. He uttered sayings, and must be classed with those who have adopted this method, from the great Hebrew poets and proverb-writers to the makers of dicta in our own day. This method sometimes wearies the reader; no more than one of Emerson's essays can be read at a time; and sometimes it sacrifices consistency. Emerson refuses to be "the slave of his yesterdays." "I am not careful to justify myself. . . . I am only an experimenter. . . . I unsettle all things. No facts are to me sacred; none are profane; I simply experiment, an endless seeker, with no Past at my back." The seed-corn of his thought, however, is from Nature's field, and in its weaker way it fructifies as truly and regularly, if as spontaneously and apparently wildly, as Nature herself when studied by the receptive mind.

As an illustration (perhaps the best single illustration that can be selected) of Emerson's literary method, let us take some words of his concerning literature itself: *

Literature is the record of the best thoughts. Every attainment and discipline which increases a man's acquaintance with the invisible world, lifts his being. Every thing that gives him a new perception of beauty, multiplies his pure enjoyments. A river of thought is always running out of the invisible world into the mind of man. Shall not they who received the largest streams spread abroad the healing waters? Homer and Plato and Pindar and Shakespeare serve many more than have heard their names. Thought is the most volatile of all things. It can not be contained in any cup, though you shut the lid never so tight. Once brought into the world, it runs over the vessel which received it into all minds that love it. The very language we speak thinks for us by the subtle distinctions which already are marked for us by its words, and every one of them is the contribution of the wit of one and another sagacious man in all the centuries of time. Consider that it is our own state of mind at any time that makes our estimate of life and the world. If you sprain your foot, you will presently come to think that Nature has sprained hers. Every thing begins to look so slow and inaccessible. And when you sprain your mind, by gloomy reflections on your failures and vexations, you come to have a bad opinion of life. Think how indigent Nature must appear to the blind, the deaf, and the idiot. Now, if you can kindle the imagination by a new thought, by heroic histories, by uplifting poetry, instantly you expand, are cheered, inspired, and become wise, and even prophetic. Music works this miracle for those who have a good ear; what omniscience has music! so absolutely impersonal, and yet every sufferer feels his secret sorrow reached. Yet to a scholar the book is as good or better. There is no hour of vexation which, on a little reflection, will not find diversion in the library. His companions are few; at the moment he has none; but, year by year, these silent friends supply their place. . . . Angels they are to us of entertainment, sympathy, and provocation. With them many of us spend the most of our life,—these silent guides, these tractable prophets, historians, and singers, whose embalmed life is the highest feat of art; who now cast their moonlight illumination over solitude, weariness, and fallen fortunes. . . . In saying these things for books, I do not for a moment forget that they are secondary, mere means, and only used in the off-hours, only in the pause, and, as it were, the sleep, or passive state, of the mind. The intellect reserves all its rights. Instantly, when the mind itself wakes, all books, all past acts are forgotten, huddled aside as impertinent in the august presence of the creator. Their costliest benefit is that they set us free from ourselves; for they wake the imagination and the sentiment, and in their inspirations we dispense with books.

In these terse words Emerson unconsciously describes his own books, and their effect upon the reader. In verity they "kindle the imagination by a new thought [in almost every essay], by heroic histories [in "Representative Men"], by uplifting poetry." And their readers "instantly expand, are cheered, inspired, and become wise."

Such was the teacher, and such the method and Emerson
the teacher. range of his thoughts and utterance. The same spirit breathes through a thousand variant words :

Our age is retrospective. It builds the sepulchres of the fathers. It writes biographies, histories, criticisms. The foregoing generations beheld God and Nature face to face; we, through their eyes. Why should not we also enjoy an original relation to the universe? Why should not we have a poetry and philosophy of insight, and not of tradition, and a religion by revelation to us, and not the history of theirs?

As a plant on the earth, so man rests on the bosom of God, nourished by unfailling fountains, and drawing at its need inexhaustible power.

The happiest man is he who learns from Nature the lesson of worship.

Wherever snow falls, or water flows, or birds fly, wherever day and night meet in twilight, wherever the blue heaven is hung by clouds, or sown with stars, wherever are forms with transparent boundaries, wherever are outlets into celestial space, wherever is danger, and awe, and love, there is Beauty, plenteous as rain, shed for thee, and though thou shouldst walk the world over, thou shalt not be able to find a condition inopportune or ignoble.

When we are exalted by ideas, we do not owe this to Plato, but to the idea, to which also Plato was debtor.

Morals implies freedom and will. The will constitutes the man. He has his life in Nature, like a beast; but choice is born in him; here is he that chooses; here is the Declaration of Independence, the July Fourth of zoölogy and astronomy. He chooses,—as the rest of creation does not.

If we must accept fate, we are not less compelled to affirm liberty, the significance of the individual, the grandeur of duty, the power of character. This is true, and that other is true. But our geometry cannot span these extreme points, and reconcile them. What to do? By obeying each thought promptly, by harping, or, if you will, pounding on each string, we learn at last its power. By this same obedience to other thoughts, we learn theirs; and then comes some reasonable hope of harmonizing them. We are sure, that, though we know not how, necessity does comport with liberty, the individual with the world, my polarity with the spirit of the times.

A man's power is hooped in by necessity, which, by many experiments, he touches on every side, until he learns its arc. The limitations refine as the soul purifies, but the ring of necessity is always perched at the top. If we give it the high sense in which the poets use it, even thought itself is not above fate; that, too, must act according to eternal laws; and all that is wilful and fantastic in it is in opposition to its fundamental essence. Last of all, high over thought, in the world of morals, fate appears as vindicator, levelling the high, lifting the low, requiring justice in man, and always striking soon or late, when justice is not done. What is useful will last; what is hurtful will sink.

Good is positive. Evil is merely privative, not absolute; it is like cold, which is the privation of heat. All evil is so much death, or nonentity. Benevolence is absolute and real. So much benevolence as a man hath, so much life hath he. Whilst a man seeks good ends, he is strong by the whole strength of nature. In so far as he roves from these ends, he bereaves himself of power, or auxiliaries; his being shrinks out of all remote channels; he becomes less and less, a mote, a point, until absolute badness is absolute death.

This last statement is reiterated in various forms, in essay after essay, in poem after poem. Perhaps its concisest expression is in a fragment printed in the posthumously enlarged collection of poems :

So guilt not traverses his tender will.

Has not the "philosophy of Emerson" been made sufficiently plain by what we have here read? Its outward glance looks toward God himself, and sees the unseen Spirit mirrored everywhere :

Thou meetest him by centuries,
And lo! he passes like the breeze;
Thou seek'st in globe and galaxy,
He hides in pure transparency;
Thou askest in fountains and in fires.
He is the essence that inquires.
He is the axis of the star;
He is the sparkle of the spar;
He is the heart of every creature;
He is the meaning of each feature.*

Over sun and star,
Over the flickering Dæmon film,
Thou must mount for love ;
Into vision where all form
In one only form dissolves,
In a region where the wheel
On which all beings ride Visibly revolves ;
Where the starred, eternal worm
Girds the world with bound and term ;
Where unlike things are like,
Where good and ill,
And joy and moan,
Melt into one.
There Past, Present, Future, shoot ; Substances at base divided In their summits are united ;
There the holy essence rolls
One through separated souls ;
And the sunny Æon sleeps, Folding Nature in its deeps ;
And every fair and every good,
Known in part or known impure
To men below,
In their archetypes endure.
The race of gods,
Of those we erring own,
Are shadows flitting up and down
In the still abodes.
The circles of that sea are laws
Which publish and which hide their cause. *

the individual. From these outward shadowy bounds of his philosophy he ever returns to the man to whom he speaks :

It is not what talents or genius a man has, but how he is to his talents, that constitutes friendship and character. The man stands by himself, the universe stands by him also.

A point of education that I can never too much insist upon is this tenet, that every individual man has a bias which he must obey, and it is only as he feels and obeys this that he rightly develops and attains his legitimate power in the world. It is his magnetic needle, which points always in one direction to his proper path, with more or less variation from any other man's. He is never happy or strong until he finds it, keeps it ; learns to be at home with himself ; learns to watch the delicate hints and insights that come to him, and to have the entire assurance of his own mind. And in this self-respect, or hearkening to the privatest oracle, he need never be at a loss. In morals, this is conscience ; in intellect, genius ; in practice, talent,—not to imitate or surpass a particular man in his way, but to bring out your own new way ; to each his own method, style, wit, eloquence.

By this individualism was founded the great nation
 American- in which Emerson so thoroughly believed, ism. and upon it must that nation rest in the future. Said Emerson in his last-published book, a lecture on " The Fortunes of the Republic " : " Let the passion for America cast out the passion for Europe. Here let there be what the earth waits for,—exalted manhood. What this country longs for is personalities, grand persons, to counteract its materialities. For it is the rule of the universe that corn shall serve man, and not man corn." More than this, Emerson would found upon "exalted manhood" not only the life of the United States, but the life of that which has been well called "The Republic of God."

What are the faults of Emerson as a thinker and writer?

The most conspicuous, doubtless, is a certain vagueness of thought and utterance. I do not refer to those poems or prose passages which, though deemed "orphanic," or mystic, or unduly concise, are yet intentional in form and clear in meaning to him who will study them. A good example of writing of this class is the much-discussed poem of "Brahma," which, to an intelligent mind willing to stop to consider the purpose of the poem, as well as its form, is as clear as daylight. I mean, rather, those prose passages (and less frequent poetic utterances) in which Emerson maunders along in well-balanced, terse sentences, which are not devoid of sense, separately, but are combined in no consistent or valuable whole. In Emerson's case it not infrequently happens that the whole is less than the sum of all its parts. This fault may be studied in the essay entitled "Immortality." Emerson thoroughly believed in personal immortality, and the essay contains fine and true sayings; but it would be difficult to construct an equal number of pages leaving a more vague and profitless effect upon the reader's mind. This single line by another poet, is worth more than the whole essay. In this matter of Hebrew explicitness on a definite religious theme Carlyle easily surpassed Emerson. Carlyle raved and spoke wildly at times, when Emerson was bland and cautious ; but Carlyle, on an august theme, was never intangible. This criticism applies but to a small portion of Emerson's writings, but it falls upon that portion with crushing force.

"Life is love, and love is eternity,"

Again, Emerson was at times superficial ; and, what is worse, spoke authoritatively on subjects concerning which he had no deep knowledge. That which he disliked he too often contemptuously condemned. His method, as has been said, was that of outspeaking, and this method, applied to the whole universe by one with intense prejudices and fixed limits, is a dangerous one. In the case of his imitators it became grotesque, and undoubtedly retarded habits of close and orderly thought in America.

But on the general estimate, the work of Emerson is of great importance to America and to the world. His name, by any standard of just judgment, must ever stand in honor. The general estimate. The ideal, the beautiful, the true, the right, the godlike, he set in burning words over against the merely material, the utilitarian, the false, the politic, the animal and worldly. He restated for the modern world the eternal principles of transcendentalism, of spiritualism, of the inner light, never lost since the days of Plato. He told the world anew, and in fresh words, of the great First Cause, by whom and in whom are all things. He ever emphasized the potency and the duty of individual freedom and of the development of the man. In this last line of work he achieved his greatest results. "Be bold, be free," he exclaimed to all men; but he added: "Be true, be right, else you will be enslaved cowards." Of him his friend, fellow-poet, and biographer has aptly written:

"From his mild throng of worshippers released,
Our Concord Delphi sends its chosen priest,
Prophet or poet, mystic, sage, or seer,
By every title always welcome here.
Why that ethereal spirit's frame describe?
You know the race-marks of the Brahmin tribe,—
The spare, slight form, the sloping shoulders' droop,
The calm, scholastic air, the clerkly stoop,
The lines of thought the narrowed features wear,
Worn sharp by studious nights and frugal fare.

"List! for he speaks! As when a king would choose
The jewels for his bride, he might refuse
This diamond for its flaw,—find that less bright
Than those, its fellows, and a pearl less white
Than fits her snowy neck, and yet at last,
The fairest gems are chosen, and made fast
In golden fetters; so, with light delays
He seeks the fittest word to fill his phrase;
Nor vain nor idle his fastidious quest,
His chosen word is sure to prove the best.

"Where in the realm of thought, whose air is song,
Does he, the Buddha of the West, belong?
He seems a wingèd Franklin, sweetly wise,
Born to unlock the secrets of the skies,—
And which the nobler calling, if 't is fair
Terrestrial with celestial to compare,—
To guide the storm-cloud's elemental flame,
Or walk the chambers whence the lightning came,

Amidst the sources of its subtle fire,
And steal their effluence for his lips and lyre ?

“ If lost at times in vague aërial flights,
None treads with firmer footstep when he lights ;
A soaring nature, ballasted with sense,
Wisdom without her wrinkles or pretence,
In every Bible he has faith to read,
And every altar helps to shape his creed.”

ESSAYISTS AND CRITICS.

THE essay, in more than one of its directions, has been represented creditably in America. If we define the word somewhat in the sense in which Lord Bacon used it, as a brief American essays. literary composition on some important theme of religion, morals, taste, intellect, or the conduct of life, the essays of Emerson, studied in the preceding chapter, fulfil the definition, and add to it an original element. If by the term essay we are reminded of the gracious and winsome work of Addison, Steele, or Lamb, in which grave and gay are discussed with pathos or humor, and in a style which is finished at its best or attitudinizing at its worst, the writings of Washington Irving occur to the mind of the reader. A few attempts have even been made—by Franklin, Irving, Mitchell, Curtis—to revive and perpetuate the periodical essay. If, again, we are thinking of the critical essay of Carlyle, Matthew Arnold, or Sainte-Beuve, it is no shame to add to their company the genuinely Yankee but soundly scholarly James Russell Lowell. Of all the chief departments of English essay-writing, but one has been ineffectively represented in the United States : the biographical or historical essay of the Macaulay type, in which the author, taking a book-title for a text, proceeds to write a miniature "life and times" or "complete history." The pages of our reviews are full of imitations of Macaulay, short paragraphs, antitheses, and all, which sadly prove that "all that flams is not flamboyant." Even in this division, however, is found the historical essay of Motley or Prescott; Motley's "Peter the Great," if it is less than Macaulay's work, is also some thing more.

Besides these writers, there is another American whose work as a poet will be considered in a future volume of this history, but who must also take his place in the present chapter. Oliver Wendell Holmes, as an essayist, does not belong to the school of Bacon, or Addison, or Lamb, or Carlyle, or Montaigne, or Sainte-Beuve. Holmes, as an essayist, does not belong to the school of Bacon, or Addison, or Lamb, or Carlyle, or Montaigne, or Sainte-Beuve. It would be easy, perhaps, to frame a comparison between him and Christopher North, and to say that Holmes performed for The Atlantic Monthly, in its early years, a service like that which Christopher gave to Maga long ago. In their writings, too, there is a little likeness. But to carry out this comparison, or any other, would be valueless, and might mislead. It is better to say that Holmes followed an original idea in his Breakfast-Table series. When he was a young man, so he tells us in the illustrated edition of "The Last Leaf," he found that some poetasters were probably imitating his metrical forms, and determined to produce a poem in a metre wholly unfamiliar, so that any imitation could be instantly detected. No such idea, doubtless, occurred to him when, half accidentally, he hit upon the rambling, varied path which "The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table" and his successors, the "Professor" and the "Poet," followed for so many years; but the result was equally his own property. In these three books, if there be a conspicuous influence, it is that of Sterne, an influence which the careful reader can discern in the pages of so widely different an author as Jean Paul Richter, and which was transferred thence to "Sartor Resartus." But literary rambling is older than Holmes, Carlyle, Richter, Sterne, or Burton's "Anatomy"; discursiveness and an alert wit have marked most of the better humorists of all the world. The reader of those of Holmes' prose works which are not novels, biographies, or brief medical disquisitions, does not stop to criticise or trace intellectual influences, he is content to enjoy, and is sure that he is in the presence of a native force, which he need not stop to label and assign to its proper shelf in the literary cabinet. On the whole, in this study of American literature, where detailed arrangement of our literary product becomes necessary, it seems clear that Doctor Holmes is to be ranked among the essayists, and that in their company he stands in a place of his own.

When Holmes was twenty years old* —so he tells us in the preface to the "Autocrat"—he printed in The New England Magazine the first of two papers called "The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table." They attracted little attention; the author frankly calls them "crude products of his uncombed literary boyhood", but he never forgot them; and when, in 1857, The Atlantic Monthly was started, he concluded to return to them and continue the series, thinking that "it would be a curious experiment to shake the same bough again, and see if the ripe fruit were better or worse than the early wind-falls." The experiment did not have to wait long for success. Holmes was nearly fifty years old, and was, in verity, able to offer to the public the "ripe fruit" of his mind. Discursive writing, or rambling talk, demands this quality of ripeness. When young writers have attempted to print dicta, ana, gossip, proverbs, pensées, or what you will in the department of literature which comes under the general head of Sayings, they have usually failed. This sort of work demands experience and reflection, neither of which is a common attribute of juvenility. No matter how light the manner or how jovial the spirit, a Montaigne, Sterne, or Lamb must be a man of wisdom and experience, in one way or another. It was well that Holmes' early series of Autocrat papers was postponed until his middle life. It was also lucky for the magazine which was in its early years the most important American monthly, that such genial wit and wisdom, such unfamiliar attractiveness of style, was to lead it to success after a general period of business depression.

"The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table" was a genuinely Yankee book—New Englandism at its best, interpreted so familiarly that running readers might comprehend its good points. Holmes is thoroughly Bostonian; an occasional trip to New York, a summer a few miles north of Boston, satisfy his desires for any outside world. He visits Europe at half-century intervals. His books have a similar local contentment. In practical sense, in alertness of thought, in neatness of phrase, in quaint mixture of earthly shrewdness and starry ideality, the words and ways of the breakfast-table of which the Autocrat is the head, represent the Massachusetts founded by the Puritans and Pilgrims, freed by Sam. Adams and his fellows, mitigated by Channing, and nationalized by Webster and Everett. If the Autocrat's wit is homely on one page, it is poetical on the next; the verse scattered throughout the book is its greatest charm. Here is a poem of mere fun, here one touched with pathos, and a little farther on a hymn of faith and trust. Holmes' Yankee shrewdness forgets the eternal verities no more than does Emerson's. Calvinism, in the eyes of its bitter and relentless opponent, Doctor Holmes, falls in a collapse as complete as that of the "One-Hoss Shay"; but his faith exclaims, in the last stanza of "The Chambered Nautilus":

"Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea!"

The underlying idea of the three Autocrat books is that of talk. That the art of conversation has not died out in this "materialistic age"; that its range is as broad, its possibilities as high, as ever; and that a chronicle of conversation in a mixed company can be made to teach and preach, yet constantly to entertain—this is the thing which the Autocrat series unconsciously proves. The merit of the three books does not, perhaps, have a rising scale; in the later volumes we do not find such poems as "The Chambered Nautilus" or "The One-Hoss Shay," nor a proverb as this: "Boston State-House is the hub of the solar system. You could n't pry that out of a Boston man if you had the tire of all creation straightened out for a crowbar." * But if the Professor is unequal to the Autocrat, it may fairly be claimed that the Poet surpasses the Professor. The art of saying things wise and witty will never leave Doctor Holmes so long as he lives. It brightens his verse; it reappears in his essays; it adorns his novels; and it even plays through his biographies and scientific writings. But merely to say a thing well, without reference to the thing said, or its effect upon the reader, forms not the whole of the author's scheme. He is describing life, Yankee or universal, in many persons and in many phases. He is fighting for common-sense, as he understands it; for healthful existence, as he would have it; for liberality in still-conservative New England. "Oliver Wendell Holmes: his Say-so," might be the title of the three Breakfast-Table books, and of much else that the author has written. The frank and quaintly humorous motto of the first of them, "Every Man his own Boswell," is more than a joke, and has more than a dramatic application to the leading character, for it goes back to the writer. And if this American humorist is wrong in making his wit and satire and pathos tell toward a beneficent and reformatory purpose, then he is wrong in the company of almost all Anglo-Saxon humorists from Chaucer down. Is there not a chemical trace of Chaucer in these Massachusetts men, Holmes and Lowell? Do they not, like the author of the "Canterbury Tales," describe the men and women and ideas of their own time and land, so that bigotry and hypocrisy may be satirized, that humanity may be raised up, and that fresh nature may be brought before the eyes of men?

Holmes deems nothing human foreign to him; therefore he works in many fields. A subsequent volume of this History must, as The man behind the books. has been said, consider his important work in poetry. A part of his prose and much of his poetry might be reviewed under the head of American humor. Yet he is an intense polemic. Against such errors—in his conviction—as homœopathy and Calvinism he battles fiercely, and hits them strong blows at random, if he gets a chance. Upon American literature he has made his own mark, and the mark is deep and characteristic and readily recognizable, whether it be in prose or verse, in humor, satire, story, or essay. In whatever Holmes writes these qualities are recognizable: good sense, though the reader may disagree with him ; good humor, though the writer be terribly in earnest ; and an alert mind. It is Holmes' misfortune, in one sense, that we instinctively apply to him the adjective clever ; his quickness is of the character that is usually allied to talent rather than to genius. More particularly this is applicable to his prose ; his novels (in which we might expect ideality), full as they are of dicta worthy of a philosopher, are not works of genius. In "Elsie Venner," "The Guardian Angel," and "A Mortal Antipathy," Holmes studies problems in psychology and heredity ; he does not, like Hawthorne in "The Scarlet Letter," put a masterly result before the reader, and keep himself in the background. Therefore the essay, perhaps Spectator-like, including a story, is his vantage-ground as a writer. The ideal element in him crops out here and there in all he writes ; but he appears moved by genius only in his choicest poems.

The prevailing impression left by this original nineteenth-century representative of Sterne on the one hand or Pope on the other, is one of wholesome A wholesome writer. someness. "Our libraries," he has himself said, "are crammed with books written by spiritual hypochondriacs, which should be transferred to studios of insanity." The row on the shelf devoted to Holmes' works is a place of sunlight and cheer. They are voluminous, garrulous, intolerant of the file or pruning-knife, irregular in merit. Says the master in "The Poet of the Breakfast-Table" : "A sick man that gets talking about himself, a woman that gets talking about her baby, and an author that begins reading out of his own book, never knows when to stop." Holmes, under many an alias, is an author reading out of his own book, and that book is his brain. But the best of it is, that his readers or hearers do not want him to stop. The very reason they like him is because he is, in his own playful words :

A Boswell, writing out himself !
 For though he changes dress and name,
 The man beneath is still the same,
 Laughing or sad, by fits and starts.
 One actor in a dozen parts,
 And whatsoe'er the mask may be,
 The voice assures us, *This is he.

The essayist, in modern times, must write for a periodical ; he can no longer, like Addison, Steele, Johnson, and the rest, make one which shall consist wholly of the work of himself and his friends. Even Franklin, in his youthful series called "The Busy-Body," printed his revised-Addisonian papers in a general newspaper. The periodical-essay, all by itself, with its miscellany of prose and verse, chiefly by one or two writers, has not flourished in America. Dana's "Idle Man" is forgotten ; Irving's "Salmagundi" is one of the least-read of his books, and Donald G. Mitchell's "Lorgnette" † is known chiefly to a few collectors of first editions. The eighteenth-century essay has forever gone out of vogue, and it is useless to try to revive it in externals.

† "Studies of the Town by an Opera-goer."

Instead of a town, with its aggregation of court, clubs, coffee-houses, theatres, "routs," etc., we have a nation. Steam and the telegraph have pretty thoroughly demolished literary provincialism, and the old type of essay was thoroughly provincial. It could exist only when London was England, or at least literary England. It must address, and be supported by, society. But Addison's work was, of course, a precursor of many things: of the careful editorial in the modern high-class weekly, of the "serial story," of criticism as we now understand it, of gentle but telling social censorship in the periodical press, indeed of the periodical press itself, in its many functions. And a part of the personal element in the eighteenth-century essay survives, in the nineteenth, in changed forms. It reappears in Christopher North's Blackwood work; in The Autocrat and his successors in The Atlantic Monthly; in George William Curtis and his Editor's Easy Chair in Harper's Magazine; in the Topics of the Time series in Scribner's Monthly, written by Dr. Holland, the plain New England moralist and reformer, representing Western Massachusetts as Holmes represents Eastern. It also survives in the personality we assign to those newspapers, like The Saturday Review or The Nation, which most carefully guard the anonymous; and, finally, in the essays that various writers contribute to periodicals, with their names, and then collect in an annual, or biennial, or occasional volume. Not much of this work is or can be great—indeed, who are the great contemporary essayists of England, France, or Germany? It must be content if it can please and quietly entertain, like "Ik Marvel's" "Reveries of a Bachelor," or "Dream-Life," over which young readers wax so sentimentally enthusiastic; Donald Grant Mitchell, "Ik Marvel," b. 1822. or if it can teach common-sense, in life and letters, to those plain Americans who lack the highest culture, but like to read, and who form the very bone and sinew of the nation. Such work as this was done by Josiah Gilbert Holland, the titles of whose books describe their character well enough: "Letters to Young People"; Josiah Gilbert Holland, "Timothy Hammered from Popular Proverbs"; 1819-1881. "Letters to the Joneses"; "Gold-Foil"; "Lessons in Life"; Plain Talks on Familiar Subjects"; "Every-Day Topics." Holland began in the sentimental age, when an alliterative pseudonym was thought indispensable; but he continued to work until his Scribner's Monthly (now The Century) instructed the nation in letters and in an art unknown to the editor himself in his early days as a country journalist. Such writers, of various degrees of merit, America has never lacked; their work cannot live in literature, but it has spread some of the amenities of thought, and softened the literary soil in rugged regions to which the future of American literature must look for support.

Broader than Dr. Holland in his range, less devoted to the work of lay-preaching, and of higher literary ability than either Holland or Mitchell, is George William Curtis. In him, more than in any

 liam Curtis, sented, mutatis mutandis, the temper of
 b. 1824. Addison and Irving, as well as some of their methods. Addison has not been repeated, nor have his times ; but if Addison had been a modern American, perhaps he might, like Curtis, have written for many a year graceful and finished little essays for the closing pages of successive numbers of Harper's Magazine, or more frequent editorials for a weekly newspaper. Curtis treats of The "Editor's Easy Chair." the play and the opera, of literary men living and dead, of old New York and bygone American days, of city customs and country ways, of national virtues and foibles, of foreign views of America and American ideas concerning Europe, of colleges and schools, economies and extravagances, war and peace, trade and culture, politics and priestcraft, woman and man. Two or three articles a month demand many a theme, and Curtis' good-sense, genial temper, broad knowledge, and winsome style, make him a good censor of American morals. That the attractiveness of his writing is elusive, is its element of strength ; for who cares to analyze that which fails if it does not please ?

Though Curtis has chosen his path, and has successfully followed it, the path is not one which,
 in itself, leads to a literary fame that is lasting.
 The "Howadji" notes in Syria or on the Nile ;
 the pleasant papers that make up "Lotos-Eating, a Summer Book" ; the sharply-drawn descriptions of some American vices and follies in the novel called "Trumps"—there is not enough in these to maintain an author's place. The public demands that its amusement, proffered by this sort of reading, shall be fresh; not often does a book of this class get a lasting hold upon favor. In the preface to the "Nile Notes of a Howadji," Curtis draws a little moral from the Persian: "'Of what use is a flower?' 'A flower is good to smell.'" The critic need not claim more than the author, for the book in question.

But for Curtis the essayist one may make high claims, with confidence. If, as I have Curtis the essayist. intimated, he is not, more than any living American writer, the successor or representative of the spirit of Addison, Lamb, Irving, I know not whose name could more fitly be mentioned. He resembles Addison rather than Lamb or Irving. If his humor, wisdom, broad culture, catholic temper, and attractive style are not well known to future readers, it will be due to the changed place of the periodical press in the last part of the nineteenth century, as compared with its place seventy-five, or a hundred and seventy-five, years ago. Month follows month, and few re-read old numbers of magazines. But if Curtis would gather in book form, in orderly arrangement, and with such revisions as might be needed, those Easy-Chair papers which have perennial interest and value, it would be found that they could be mentioned with the best literature of their class. That brilliant satire on New York "shoddy" society, Curtis' "Potiphar Papers," is read, thirty years after its issue; the periodical essays, if collected for the library and aptly titled anew, or called simply "The Easy Chair," would not sooner lose appreciative readers.

All the later American essayists whose names stand out from the many, may be divided, for convenience' sake, into the following classes: Transcendentalists, miscellaneous essayists, critics, and essayists of themes connected with the world of nature. In such a classification, or in any other, of course, the name of Emerson leads his own division and all the rest; while of the miscellaneous essayists the chief is Holmes, if he be assigned to their number. No argument is needed to show that Lowell is the most conspicuous American critic, the writer whom we would instructively name as occupying a representative position like that of Mr. Arnold in England. Lowell represents indigenous American culture as Arnold represents English. In the fourth and last division the work of Thoreau stands foremost; indeed, it may be doubted whether any other name, in the pleasant company of American writers on nature, is worthy of mention beside his. It seems reasonably certain that these four names—I will rather say the three names, for Emerson's place is secure—will not soon be forgotten, and it is equally apparent that they are now without American rivals in their respective departments of literary labor. If, again, we fall back upon the term "Concord authors," a characterization perhaps not quite so valueless as the term "Lake School," we find the names of Emerson and Thoreau in proper conjunction, the conjunction of best and good in partially kindred work. Inferior to Emerson in every trait of character and in every element of genius, Thoreau, like Emerson, was at least a son of the soil, true to himself, and able to make an original contribution to the literature of his country.

Of the goodly company of Concord writers, some took up their residence in the town before it became famous, and others turned to it because it had become the "Transcendental Mecca" of America, or, in common English, because Emerson lived there. But Thoreau's right to be called a Concord author is certainly complete, for he was born in the town, July 12, 1817, long before it had any dream of becoming a Mecca, or any thing but a solid, honest New England farming-community. As Thoreau's name indicates, his ancestry was French, but the family, on the father's side, had been English and American for several generations, while Thoreau's mother was a New Englander named Dunbar. A European reader who should be misled by Thoreau's name, and think him aught but a Yankee farmer, would lose one secret of his success as essayist, naturalist, and poet. He was the New England rural onlooker, the faithful chronicler of the woods, streams, fields, and skies of his world, that is to say, of the town of his birth. He had seen something of outside life; had graduated at Harvard College; had learned how to survey land; could make a good lead-pencil; and could till a plain garden in fair fashion. There exists a somewhat common idea that Thoreau was a life-long recluse; in fact his hut-life near Walden Pond formed no more than a brief period in his career. He travelled little, but thoroughly enjoyed a trip to Canada, or a pedestrian visit to Cape Cod or the Maine woods; and he made quite voluminous records of such journeys. His mind was simple, so were his wants; and there seems little doubt that his marked eccentricities were genuine, and not assumed for effect. He was no city gentleman, masquerading at Brook Farm in the garb of a day-laborer, and dreaming of reorganizing the world on a Fourierite-phalanstery basis. He knew nature and loved it; in his descriptions of his life there is no affectation or attitudinizing of the Walt Whitman order. In fact, he was so genuinely autochthonous, so enthusiastically and perpetually devoted to the woods and waters of his home, that this very affection made him selfish, neglectful of his duties as a citizen and a man among men, and, so far as his non-literary influence was concerned, of little use in the world. One writer has called Thoreau "Emerson's leading pupil"; and it is probably true that no writer who came directly under the influence of the Concord sage so aptly learned some of the lessons he taught, and at the same time preserved unmixed that independence of character upon which Emerson ever insisted. But the pupil fell short of the master's attainments and work, not, of course, in quantity alone, but also in quality. Emerson liked certain elements in Thoreau, and Thoreau, in his undemonstrative way, assigned Emerson a place shared in his mind by no other modern man. But the largeness of Emerson was painfully lacking in Thoreau; the one got, in his close library and in his occasional walks afield, a charity which the other imbibed with the free and long draughts of country air in his constant life amid the voices and silences of nature. That Thoreau got near to Nature's heart, and described her in simple, true, poetic, eloquent words, is one of the facts for which every reader of American literature is thankful. It may be questioned whether another naturalist of his time has better portrayed a part of her breadth and depth, her greatness and littleness, and her deep philosophy. Thoreau peered into the clear waters of Walden Pond, and saw more than "a straight stick bent in a pool." But, notwithstanding his life among large things, and the breadth of his writing, his personal character was not large. I have mentioned Whitman's conscious or unconscious artificiality, as contrasted with Thoreau's sincerity; yet in the character of Whitman are more largeness and light than in that of Thoreau.

The writings of Thoreau are comprised in nine volumes—a little library of words written from, to, and in nature. Behind his descriptions is a thoughtful mind, and his observations are strengthened by a decent culture, begun at college and aided by constant reading of a few books. By the bole of the elm-tree Plato seems to stand, and Greek summer hovers over Massachusetts winter. Here is the life of nature, and back of the life, the mind of nature. One of Thoreau's biographers* was right in calling him a "poet-naturalist." He was too much a poet to forget the soul of things, the ideal behind the real; and too much a naturalist to neglect the constant habit of accurate observation. He might have said to the forests and streams of Concord, to its fauna and flora: "A chiel's amang ye, takin' notes." His notes of nature and natural history were taken because he loved his subjects, and not because he wanted to rush into print. Of his nine books only two, "Walden; or, Life in the Woods," and "A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers," were printed during the author's lifetime. After his death his friends gathered from his voluminous papers, not even yet all published, an account of the Maine woods, a shrewd and entertaining record of a pedestrian tour on Cape Cod; divers excursions in field and forest; the story of the sight-seeings of a Yankee in Canada, and extracts from his journal, collected under the titles of "Early Spring in Massachusetts," and "Summer." Besides these, there is a volume made up of comparatively unimportant letters and highly interesting poems, one or two of which I shall presently copy. Of these books, the most characteristic ones—the entities, so to speak, are Walden and Cape Cod, which, with the poems, slightly stand out from the rest. As a rule, however, Thoreau is a remarkably even writer; his chapters were like his days, merely separate parts of a serene and little-diversified life, free from the restraints and pleasures of a real home, remote from burning human hopes and struggles, and, while caring much for the slave, caring little for country. No one would have thought of turning to this isolated life for personal sympathy, but Thoreau, in his turn, stood in small need of eliciting human help beyond his family, between whose members and himself there was a mild but genuine affection. He seemed to add something to the Emersonian courageous individuality, but in fact he let go from it the strongest part, its helpful humanity. It would not be a pleasant task to cull from Thoreau's writings proofs of an individualism which, to speak plainly, was terribly unlike the individualism of Jesus. After all, we read and praise Thoreau for what he tells us of the things he saw, and not for his records of himself.* In my copy of the life of Thoreau, by F. B. Sanborn—a record which, in thoroughness, painstaking accuracy, and hearty enthusiasm, leaves nothing lacking on the biographer's part—is a photograph of Thoreau, taken in 1861, and bearing Mr. Sanborn's attestation: "This was the very man." The bearded face is that of one alert, thoughtful, sensitive, poetic—not the dull, ugly farmer represented in some woodcuts from another picture, without the full beard. But in the full eyes are suspicion, timorousness, aloofness, showing that he was, as Hawthorne found him, "a singular character, a young man with much of wild, original nature still remaining in him." Hawthorne added, with that fine blending of humor, justice, and critical power which he could use in so masterly a way: "It may well be that such a sturdy, uncompromising person is fitter to meet occasionally in the open air than to have as a permanent guest at table and fireside."

poems.

Light-winged smoke! Icarian bird,
Melting thy pinions in thy upward flight;
Lark without song, and messenger of dawn,
Circling above the hamlets as thy nest;
Or else, departing dream, and shadowy form
Of midnight vision, gathering up thy spirits;
By night star-veiling, and by day
Darkening the light and blotting out the sun;
Go thou, my incense, upward from this hearth,
And ask the gods to pardon this clear flame.

Some of those who felt the Transcendental influence could certainly paint word-pictures of nature in a way of which a Greek need not have been ashamed. Of Thoreau's little list of printed poems "Smoke in Winter" is somewhat inferior, and the pieces on "Mist" and "Haze" much inferior. In the four stanzas called "The Fisher's Boy" is one half-pathetic quatrain:

I have but few companions on the shore:
They scorn the strand who sail upon the sea;
Yet oft I think the ocean they've sailed o'er
Is deeper known upon the strand to me.

Was Thoreau a poet? Yes, in thought; in such scanty poetic utterances as this; and, outside the poetic art, in not infrequent prose passages of an essentially poetic character. Take up and read almost at random some pages from Thoreau's essay on "Wild Apples"—an essay which fairly represents the man as he was, and his average work, and see how he found poetry and loveliness in one of New England's poorest and scrubbiest things :

Though these are indigenous, like the Indians, I doubt whether they are any hardier than those backwoodsmen among the apple-trees, which, though descended from cultivated stock, plant themselves in distant fields and forests, where the soil is favorable to them. I know of no trees which have more difficulties to contend with, and which more sturdily resist their foes. These are the ones whose story we have to tell. It oftentimes reads thus :

Near the beginning of May, we notice little thickets of apple-trees just springing up in the pastures where cattle have been,—as the rocky ones of our Easterbrooks country, or the top of Nobscot Hill, in Sudbury. One or two of these perhaps survive the drought and other accidents,—their very birthplace defending them against the encroaching grass and some other dangers, at first.

In two years' time 't had thus Reached the level of the rocks,
Admired the stretching world,
Nor feared the wandering flocks.

But at this tender age
Its sufferings began :
There came a browsing ox
And cut it down a span.

This time, perhaps, the ox does not notice it amid the grass ; but the next year, when it had grown more stout, he recognizes it for a fellow-emigrant from the old country, the flavor of whose leaves and twigs he well knows; and though at first he pauses to welcome it, and express his surprise, and gets for answer, "The same cause that brought you here brought me," he nevertheless browses it again, reflecting, it may be, that he has some title to it.

Thus cut down annually, it does not despair; but, putting forth two short twigs for every one cut off, it spreads out low along the ground in the hollows or between the rocks, growing more stout and scrubby, until it forms, not a tree as yet, but a little pyramidal, stiff, twiggy mass, almost as solid and impenetrable as a rock. Some of the densest and most impenetrable clumps of bushes that I have ever seen, as well on account of the closeness and stubbornness of their branches as of their thorns, have been these wild-apple scrubs. They are more like the scrubby fir and black spruce on which you stand, and sometimes walk, on the tops of mountains, where cold is the demon they contend with, than any thing else. No wonder they are prompted to grow thorns at last, to defend themselves against such foes. In their thorniness, however, there is no malice, only some malic acid.

Could we ask for a more loyal, a more affectionately minute friendliness for the homeliest and forlornest things in nature? Here is no White of Selborne, amid "field paths and green lanes" of moist England, but a Yankee son of the cold New England soil, and lover of every thing that grows thereon. Again :

In the fields only are the sours and bitters of Nature appreciated; just as the wood-chopper eats his meal in a sunny glade, in the middle of a winter day, with content, basks in a sunny ray there and dreams of summer in a degree of cold which, experienced in a chamber, would make a student miserable. They who are at work abroad are not cold, but rather it is they who sit shivering in houses. As with temperatures, so with flavors; as with cold and heat, so with sour and sweet. This natural raciness, the sours and bitters which the diseased palate refuses, are the true condiments. Let your condiments be in the condition of your senses. To appreciate the flavor of these wild apples requires vigorous and healthy senses, papillæ firm and erect on the tongue and palate, not easily flattened and tamed. From my experience with wild apples, I can understand that there may be reason for a savage's preferring many kinds of food which the civilized man rejects. The former has the palate of an outdoor man. It takes a savage or wild taste to appreciate a wild fruit. What a healthy out-of-door appetite it takes to relish the apple of life, the apple of the world, then!

Thoreau here, as in not a few other passages in his books, was describing his own tastes and writing his autobiography. He hunted out and relished things that had the "natural raciness, the sours and bitters" of life. His vigorous and healthy senses appreciated the flavor of the wild apples that grew on the central tree of Nature's Eden. He was at one with the savage in "preferring many kinds of food which the civilized man rejects." He had the "palate of an out-door man," plus the brain and wide thought of the reading man, the graduate of a college. His wild taste appreciated wild fruit, but, unlike the savage, he could frame and print words which told the cultured world of attractive things it had passed by. Here was "a healthy out-of-door appetite" in a book-maker and sight-seer, and we are given the benefit of his wanderings and close observations. At length we catch his enthusiasm, if we lacked it before, and enjoy with him even the "frozen-thawed" apple of a winter on Massachusetts Bay, exclaiming with him, and thinking of his own books the while: "What are the imported half-ripe fruits of the torrid South, to this fruit matured by the cold of the frigid North? These are those crabbed apples with which I cheated my companion, and kept a smooth face that I might tempt him to eat. Now we both greedily fill our pockets with them, —bending to drink the cup and save our lappets from overflowing juice,—and grow more social with their wine. Was there one that hung so high and sheltered by the tangled branches that our sticks could not dislodge it? It is a fruit never carried to market, that I am aware of,—quite distinct from the apple of the markets, as from dried apples and cider,—and it is not every winter that produces it in perfection."

Not many literary tasks are easier than to write a pretty good article about the fields, forests, or mountains, the rivers, lakes, or sea, the squirrels or the birds. But to describe nature in a masterly way, to "win the secret of a weed's plain heart," to discover what the primrose really means, to watch the growth-spirit "climb to a soul in grass and flowers"—all this is given to few men of letters. In American poetry we find most of our good writing on out-door themes; our prosers have not so excelled in this branch of literature. Scattered words, in metre or in prose, contain the greater part of our under-the-sky poetry or wisdom; this, indeed, is what we might expect, for is not

Nature a being of many and fleeting moods, not easily to be caught, or not to be enjoyed for long?

Thoreau stands by himself; it is hardly worth while to mention others in his company. Perhaps, by and by, John Burroughs will enjoy a similar but lesser renown; nowadays he has almost as many readers as his great predecessor, and is, to a large part of our reading public, the best known essayist on natural themes. His cheery-titled books: "Wake-Robin," "Winter Sunshine," "Locusts and Wild Honey," "Birds and Poets," "Fresh Fields," invite the perusal of chapters which, while they lack Thoreau's quaintness, creative power, transcendental insight, tang, are yet the work of a watchful observer, who lives with, and almost for, the birds and the fields. Burroughs does not annoy us with the cantankerousness and semi-selfishness which sometimes peer unpleasantly from the pages of Thoreau. He feels and he thinks, but as a guide to "fresh fields and pastures new" he is of a sunny and not aggressively individual temper. His special merit is that of a chronicler of bird-ways. The American wood-singers have been fortunate in their friends; one or two other writers, besides the technical ornithologists not properly men of letters, have written their biographies in that sympathetic manner which belongs distinctly to the nineteenth century.

Before turning to the field of American criticism, I mention the work of a writer still living in the fulness of his literary powers: Charles Dudley Warner, humorist, essayist, traveller, biographer, juvenile writer, and editor. Warner is chiefly, one might almost say always, the essayist. His humor is not wit; he pleases by the diffused light which illuminates his writings on various themes, not by any startling or sensational effect. American humor, as displayed in his masterpiece, "My Summer in a Garden," is shown in its better estate. Warner's intellectual kinship is with Irving, Curtis, and Holmes, not with Artemus Ward or Mark Twain,—though he wrote a book in collaboration with the last-named popular writer. Truth and wholesomeness, a genuine local flavor without coarseness, and a power to amuse without conspicuous effort,—these qualities one finds in his graceful papers. Delicacy of touch, as seen in his work, is after all the prevalent characteristic of the really representative American humorous essayists, the men who, like Warner, have actually contributed to literature. Those in search of rude and clownish "merriment," may not appreciate the fact at the present time, but the future may be trusted to emphasize the truth of the statement.

It would at first seem as though the department of criticism, to which we now turn, could have received slight development within the brief period of the history of American literature. Criticism did not exist in this country during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, nor did it make much showing until the nineteenth century was well advanced. In the first quarter of that century newspapers multiplied and a few reviews appeared; Irving and his fellows put forth some work in which a quasi-critical spirit was noticeable ; but not before 1840 did genuine, strong criticism begin to take its place in American letters. It could hardly do so at an earlier time. Roughly speaking, the whole history of American poetry, of any high order, is of no more remote a date than the year (1835) which has been set as the beginning of the Victorian literature. Criticism is not a thing that can anticipate creation, and certainly it is remarkable that it appeared so soon. Had the United States been a new country, speaking a language not yet developed into literary forms, the interval between the appearance of the good poem and the good essay would have been far longer than it was. But, notwithstanding humble colonialism and aggressive and sensitive young nationalism, of course the culture of England was, and had been, an American birthright. England, too, was beginning to feel, in belles-lettres and in thought, a new Continental influence—that of Germany ; therefore America might readily, at the beginning of her age of literary criticism, enjoy the help of the same new force.

I do not think that the service of Longfellow, in this matter of the development of American criticism and culture, has ever been sufficiently recognized. As a poet, he has been and still is the most popular of American writers.

Henry
Longfellow,
1807-1882.

As a romancer, and even as a writer of sketches of travel, he has his smaller public of appreciative readers. We do not, however, often think of him as a promoter of culture, of the knowledge of general European literature, and therefore of the incipient critical spirit in the United States. In regard to these things it may be doubted whether we owe more to any other man. Longfellow was of academic training; he had occupied a professor's chair in two of the principal colleges of New England; he had lived in Europe for a considerable time, familiarizing himself with the Old World's history, legends, romance, scenery, and men and women. Few Americans were so well acquainted with the literatures of France, Germany, Italy, and Spain. His spirit was gentle and sympathetic, inclining him to studies of a broad range. Certainly he was no scholastic iconoclast, but the very tenderness of his mind made him catholic-tempered. Breadth and catholicity of real knowledge were precisely the things of which America stood in need in the decade after 1830. It had reaped whatever benefits were to come from young national virility, positiveness, activity, bigotry; and it was beginning to be stirred by a craze for a hundred isms and fresh reforms, good, bad, and ridiculous. But abolitionism, teetotalism, Fourierism, Millerism, Mormonism, hydropathy, homœopathy, Swedenborgianism, could hardly promote that wide and deep culture too long delayed in America, any more than Calvinism or the Declaration of Independence had promoted it. A sentimental period, in 1830, was just at hand, a period for which real culture feels a not unnatural disgust. "O youth and innocence! O milk and water!" exclaimed the cynical Byron. Youth and innocence are the best and brightest things; but they are not synonymous with literary insipidity and artificiality. Longfellow, the poet of sympathy, yet the well-equipped scholar, was the very man to influence American literature in a wholesome way.

The influence exerted by Longfellow was a broad and general one, not sharply to be separated into divisions of original verse, translation, fiction, or essay. It began when, in 1830, he put forth at Bowdoin College his "Novelas Españolas" and "Manuel de Proverbes Dramatiques"; nor had it ceased when, in 1882, appeared "In the Harbor" (poems), the second part of his collection called "Ultima Thule." We shall have further occasion to study its methods and effects in other lines; in this place, setting aside the poetry, the romance "Hyperion," and the story "Kavanagh," we take up "Outre-Mer" and the little collection of essays called "Drift-Wood."

When "Outre-Mer" appeared, in 1834 and 1835, European travel was still uncommon among Americans. A few more ambitious graduates were able to put "P. D. Gött." after their names, and an occasional George Ticknor could boast the acquaintance of the leaders of contemporary English literature. But a trip to Britain or the Continent was so rare that it was frequent to follow it by a bit of book-making, generally of the rhapsodical or diaristic style. Nearly all of these early books of travel have gone to the oblivion they richly deserved, after performing their humble work of instruction or amusement. "Outre-Mer" was a volume of a different class. It has lived, and is still occasionally read; it would doubtless have kept a place in literature even had it not boasted the name of an author afterward famous in other and higher work. To go with any intelligent traveller to such places as Longfellow describes: to a Norman diligence, to Auteuil, or Père la Chaise, or the valley of the Loire; to travel in his kindly company to Rome in midsummer, or a Spanish village, was pleasant and profitable. But Longfellow offered more than chronicles or diaries; he introduced to readers not over-familiar with such themes, the "Devotional Poetry of Spain," "Ancient Spanish Ballads," and "The Trouvères." On his pages appear the landscapes and the men of France, Spain, and Italy; but their spirit is made more prominent than their merely external and picturesque characteristics. To the literary papers this remark applies, of course, with even greater force. Few Americans, in 1835, knew enough to give any instruction on such themes as Longfellow had chosen; still fewer could have conveyed that instruction in a winsome way. It would be idle to call "Outre-Mer" a great book; it would be less than just to deny that, appearing when it did, it was an eminently useful one. Its sentimentality was sufficiently marked to approve it to an age in which the sway of Laura-Matilda was widespread; but that sentimentality was romantic, not silly, and led its readers toward a broader culture.

Appended to "Outre-Mer," in the present editions of Longfellow's prose works, are eight papers to which the author gave the modest title, "Drift-Wood, a Collection of Essays."

Longfellow, at an early age, had become a contributor to The North American Review, which may fairly be called the best organ of periodical thought in America, notwithstanding a certain provincialism and a mutual-admiration-society tone, which used to make Poe frantic. This "Drift-Wood" collection was already familiar, in good measure, to readers of that periodical; it contains some of Longfellow's distinctly critical writing, for the most part dating from the years 1837 and 1838. Here we have a descriptive account of a poem then almost wholly unfamiliar in America, Bishop Tegnér's "Frithiof's Saga," now accessible in several translations. In a careful North-American essay is also given a cordial welcome to Hawthorne's "Twice-Told Tales," just a dozen years after Hawthorne and Longfellow left Brunswick in the same graduating class of Bowdoin College. Abler than either of these is the descriptive account of "Anglo-Saxon Literature" (1838). At that time "scholars" regarded Anglo-Saxon much as they regard Icelandic at the present day: not dreaming that it is simply the first English, and that without its study no intelligent knowledge of our language or literature can be attained. Long before the day of Sievers in Germany, Sweet in England, or March in America, Professor Longfellow gave an intelligent account of the literature of our remote forefathers, justly estimating its spirit and achievements, translating a few of its best passages, and making the whole essay an attractive one for necessarily ignorant readers, while he avoided undue didacticism or a patronizing tone.

These papers, to which should be added the introductions to the various divisions of his edited collection devoted to "The Poets and Poetry of Europe," show very plainly the merits and limitations of Longfellow as a critic. He belonged, by nature and choice, to the expository school; he was unfitted for severe, destructive, or brilliant critical work, and his ability lay chiefly in his power to describe, justly and attractively, the things he liked. But it may be doubted whether the expository school has had a better representative in America. Longfellow liked good literature only, and therefore his kindly nature was removed from the danger of praising poor work. Too learned to commend trash, too gentle to wield a critical scourge, his work of instruction and stimulus was done at a time when it was very effective. Ridicule, satire, and stern denunciation were also needed, and they came, in due season, from other hands.

It certainly seems a long step to turn from the gentle poet, translator, romancer, essayist, and critic, whose name has just been under consideration, to Edgar Allan Poe, in whose papers we find one ferociously entitled "Mr. Longfellow and Other Plagiarists." The two men are in many respects extremes: in personal character, in literary methods, in the general nature of their writings, and finally in their criticisms. Longfellow introduced to Americans some of the treasures of foreign literature; Poe wrote chiefly upon his national contemporaries. Longfellow wrote gracious words of appreciation; Poe distributed praise and blame with an impartiality that sometimes seemed random. He used to claim that Longfellow was always a New Englander, yet the writings of the latter were largely on foreign themes, while Poe, who once planned a "History of American Literature," was a Bostonian by birth, and a nationalist with some Southern proclivities, so far as his critical bias was concerned. The dissimilarity between these two men need not further be discussed. Poe, while Longfellow was benefiting our literature in one way, was aiding it in another, as will presently be seen.

The three "problematic characters" in American literature, the men whose personal qualities and whose literary work demand the most patient study and the most earnest attempt toward a just critical estimate, are Emerson, Hawthorne, and Poe. A previous chapter has considered Emerson's prose; his poems, as well as those of Poe, and, of course, all the prose writings of Poe and Hawthorne, will be taken up in detail in the later volume of this work. Poe alone requires a preliminary word in this place; it should be said, therefore, that his genius as poet and story-writer was high and true, winning an intense and apparently lasting success within narrow and rigidly marked lines of genius. His poems and tales are so different from his criticisms that there is no reason why, with this remark, the latter should not be separately considered, as indeed they must be in any record of American essays. They did a useful but irregular work, and are deeply marked by both strength and weakness.

It is idle to call Poe, as one of his biographers has done, the most learned of American authors. In the matter of acquirements, Longfellow, to take a single name, far surpassed him. It is much nearer the truth to say, with Mr. Stedman, that he "possessed literary resources and knew how to make use of them"; that he "easily threw a glamour of erudition about his work, by the use of phrases from old authors he had read, or among whose treatises he had foraged with special design"; and that he "had little exact scholarship," but "a good reference-knowledge." To his criticisms of American and English writers he brought an unquestionable familiarity with the books discussed; an invincible courage; a hearty dislike for Bostonianism; a hatred of shams; an inability to divest himself of some personal considerations, favorable or unfavorable, affecting the authors criticised; and, in fact, a willingness to use criticism to gratify his own friendships and hatreds.

Poe's critical writing, as collected in the permanent edition of his works, consists of the following: the essays entitled "The Poetic Principle," "The Rationale of Verse," and "The Philosophy of Composition"; part of a paper called "Magazine Writing—Peter Snook"; reviews of Stephens' "Arabia Petræa," Wilmer's "Quacks of Helicon," and Irving's "Astoria"; part of his illustrated chapter on "Autographs"; the series called "The Literati," and similar short criticisms on American authors; and like papers on Mrs. Browning (then Miss Barrett, whom Poe, in one of his dedications, called "the noblest of her sex"), R. H. Horne,

Macaulay, Lever, Marryat, Cockton, and Dickens. This is a large body of writing, filling about two of the six volumes of the best (1884) edition of his works. More than sixty American authors are discussed in separate papers, besides the writers more briefly characterized in the analysis of autographs. These American criticisms naturally claim first notice here. The most obvious reflection is with reference to the poor material Poe had to handle. To read the list of names is to walk through a forlorn and neglected graveyard. Who, asks the modern reader, were George H. Colton, William Kirkland, Freeman Hunt, Piero Maroncelli, Mary Gove, Henry Cary, James Lawson, Elizabeth Bogart, Mary E. Hewitt, Rufus Dawes, Thomas Ward, William W. Lord, Henry B. Hirst, William Wallace, Why take the trouble to read and characterize the books of John W. Francis, Ralph Hoyt, Laughton Osborn, Ann S. Stephens, Caroline M. Kirkland, Prosper M. Wetmore, Epes Sargent, Elizabeth Frieze Ellet, the Davidson precocities, Estelle Anna Lewis, etc.? Almost the only names whom the average modern reader knows or cares to know are those of Channing, Cooper, Halleck, Bryant, Longfellow, Hawthorne, Lowell, and Bayard Taylor. Even Margaret Fuller, Mrs. Child, Miss Sedgwick, and Simms are more respected than read, while Willis himself, the great "sacred, passionate, and humorous" poet, seems to modern readers "something between a remembrance of Count d'Orsay and an anticipation of Oscar Wilde." * All this was not

* O. W. Holmes, "A Mortal Antipathy," p. 4.

Poe's fault; the poor man certainly raked and scraped the field of "American literature" with sufficient assiduity. If the result was not very valuable, certainly it was not alone the critic's mistake. What he said of his illustrious company of incipient celebrities and moribund mediocrities was sometimes bitter, unjust, limited in range, brightened or darkened by personal prejudices, and therefore almost as unread to-day as the books he described. But much in his method and achievement deserves grateful praise. Poe cleared the heated and unwholesome atmosphere which overhung our literature; he exposed many pretentious humbugs, who attitudinized as "men of letters," or "poetesses"; and, if we except his pseudo-critical praise of the verse of his sympathizing women-friends, and his angry screams over his men-enemies, the general average of his criticism was both intelligent and wholesome. He showed American authors and scribblers that there existed among them a critic who, though not without favor, could at least write without fear. Not all the little writers whom he denounced, passed at once from favor; but Poe's criticisms undoubtedly hastened their disappearance. As for his discussion of the greater names, such as Longfellow or Hawthorne in this country, Tennyson or Mrs. Browning in England, it was marred by the faults above mentioned; but many of its dicta, made in an early day, have been verified by later judgments of posterity. Poe seems to later critics more often right than wrong; and sometimes his analyses and prophecies were surprisingly accurate. With a mind not unjustly priding itself upon ratiocinative power, this could hardly be otherwise.

The three papers entitled "The Poetic Principle," "The Philosophy of Composition," and "The Rationale of Verse," belong to a broader and deeper kind of criticism. Upon them Poe spent much care, re-writing and revising them in the painstaking method he so frequently applied to his poems. Their theories are not always tenable. Thus Poe's argument that a long poem is an absurdity, would do away with the "Iliad," the "Divine Comedy," "Paradise Lost," "Hamlet." The place of the lyric, whether as long as "The Ancient Mariner" or as short as Poe's own "To Helen," is certainly safe and lasting; but it is not the only kind of true poetry. Yet such an erroneous proposition as this Poe would elaborate right well. His kindred assertion that beauty is the sole end of art (sublimely true in the sense that "beauty is its own excuse for being") Poe himself modified, not only in verse but in more than one explicit statement, by the addition of the Saxon idea of Right. Indeed, his discussion of the relations between Beauty and Duty is, in the main, in full accord with the principles which have regulated English verse from Cædmon to Tennyson. Here he was trying to get down to the philosophy of poetry, as, in "The Rationale of Verse," he gave us the first elaborate American attempt to expound rhythmical science. His much-discussed analysis (in "The Philosophy of Composition") of the construction of his own poem, "The Raven," may or may not have been true; probably it was substantially trustworthy ; but in it and in these other essays he was benefiting American literature by the nature of the subjects he chose for critical discussion, and by the general method which he pursued. In these later days, certainly, there have been highly cultured critics who have wandered farther astray than did Poe, as regards both literary art and literary ethics.

Poets, in the latter half of the nineteenth century, have been critics as well as creators. In the elder Poets who have been critics. days they used to be content to sing, but in these complex times they discuss the nature of their art, the achievements of their contemporaries, and many questions affecting literature and life. Nor is this wholly a sign of weakness ; a descent from Parnassus to a lower land. The critical function is as legitimate as the creative, and in a true sense it is as high. Some criticism is creative literature in the best sense. Not until we rule out the essay as a form of literature, and not until we perform the impossible task of saying where the essay ends and criticism begins, can we degrade the latter. Again, the modern poet must himself be a man in affairs, if not of affairs ; one who feels and knows the time-spirit. A third and more obvious reason why poets have so often become critics, is to be found in the development of periodical literature. The poet now has other revenues, and other means of intellectual expression, than the bound volume. Perhaps he does not write less poetry, or less valuable poetry, because he also writes prose for the magazines. He aids in his support, and meanwhile instructs the general public. If hack-work is a foe to poetry, not less is the spirit of the amateur and the dilettant. I cannot see that Longfellow and Poe were less poets because, for instruction or for money-making, they gave us critical essays.

A similar remark could surely be made concerning the foremost American critic, James Russell Lowell, one of whose poems, indeed, bears the title James Russell Lowell, b. 1819. "A Fable for Critics." Here are poetical thought, critical aptness, sympathy, wit, and good helpful writing, all in one. Before the reader turns to the later and weightier critical work of Lowell in prose, he finds that he has half finished this rollicking and brilliant Fable, which "reads itself," a generation after its first appearance. Lowell had almost "A Fable for Critics." the same material which Poe had used a few years before, and it must be confessed that he employed it to better advantage. Take at the outset what he wrote, in the following hurrying but not unjust lines, of Poe himself :

There comes Poe, with his raven, like Barnaby Rudge,
Three fifths of him genius and two fifths sheer fudge,
Who talks like a book of iambs and pentameters,
In a way to make people of common-sense damn metres,
Who has written some things quite the best of their kind,
But the heart somehow seems all squeezed out by the

As apt as the second line of the passage just quoted, and as fully justified by later criticism, was Lowell's estimate of Hawthorne, which, it should be remembered, deserves all the more praise because it was printed in 1848, before the appearance of "The Scarlet Letter," "The House of the Seven Gables,"

“The Blithedale Romance,” or “The Marble Faun” :

There is Hawthorne, with genius so shrinking and rare
That you hardly at first see the strength that is there ;
A frame so robust, with a nature so sweet,
So earnest, so graceful, so solid, so fleet,
Is worth a descent from Olympus to meet ;
'T is as if a rough oak that for ages had stood,
With his gnarled bony branches like ribs of the wood,
Should bloom, after cycles of struggle and scathe,
With a single anemone trembly and rathe ;
His strength is so tender, his mildness so meek,
That a suitable parallel sets one to seek,—
He 's a John Bunyan Fouqué, a Puritan Tieck ;
When Nature was shaping him, clay was not granted
For making so full-sized a man as she wanted,
So, to fill out her model, a little she spared
From some finer-grained stuff for a woman prepared,
And she could not have hit a more excellent plan
For making him fully and perfectly man.

All this, full of humor, and nominally put into a dramatic form, is of course genuine criticism. It took Hawthorne's readers many years, which they spent in calling him “weird” or perhaps “morbid,” to discover the ethical purpose underlying the art of “Ethan Brand,” “The Threefold Destiny,” or “Lady Eleanore's Mantle” ; but Lowell here pointed it out plainly enough, and did not forget to describe the large manliness and sympathetic womanliness of Hawthorne's genius, which, far from being morbid or abnormal, was wholesome through and through. It was just, too, to call Emerson's “a Greek head on right Yankee shoulders” ; to say :

From those rare depths of soul that have ne'er been excelled ;
They 're not epics, but that does n't matter a pin,
In creating, the only hard thing 's to begin ;
A grass-blade 's no easier to make than an oak ;
and to add :

 In the most of his poems are mines of rich matter,
 But thrown in a heap with a crush and a clatter.

Other American authors, great and small, received similar analysis ; the whole, despite its rollicking style and its friendly tone, leaving upon the mind no impression that American literature in 1848 was hopelessly sentimental or likely to remain immature for too long a period. At any rate, there was enough of it to deserve the attention of a critic who knew when to denounce, when to correct, and when to praise, and who could prove, in a single work, the fallacy of the old idea that a critic is a broken-down creator. Not every writer would have either the sense or the justice to characterize himself as did Lowell in these clever lines, first, of course, printed anonymously, with the rest of the poem :

There is Lowell, who 's striving Parnassus to climb,
With a whole bale of isms tied together with rhyme,
He might get on alone, spite of brambles and boulders,
But he can't with that bundle he has on his shoulders.
The top of the hill he will ne'er come nigh reaching Till he learns the distinction 'twixt singing and preaching ;
His lyre has some chords that would ring pretty well,
But he 'd rather by half make a drum of the shell,
And rattle away till he 's old as Methusalem,
At the head of a march to the last new Jerusalem.

We have half forgotten the Lowell here satirized—the reformer of the days of anti-slavery, and anti-capital punishment, and Tennysonian echoes, and refined sentimentality; we know, rather, the poet of “The Vision of Sir Launfal,” the satirist of “The Biglow Papers,” the austere patriot of the “Commemoration Ode,” and the widely-cultured critic in the editorial chair of the North American Review. The later Lowell became the greater because he learned to dis sever his isms from his art, only supplying their place, however, by that larger spirit of liberty and loyalty to humanity which must ever inform the better books of the world.

At first, even as a prose critic, he was touched by the sentimentality of the time in which he began his literary career. In 1844 the local bookseller in Cambridge, John Owen, who issued some “Conversations on Some of the Old Poets.” of Longfellow’s early books, published for Lowell a volume of “Conversations on Some of the Old Poets.” The book was a 16mo, the back of which bore, in gilt, the simple title “Conversations—Lowell,” as though it might be “Conversations on Personal Religion,” or something similar. In the pages of the book, too, is a gently-sentimental spirit that seems archaic in comparison with that of his later prose volumes, with their brighter titles: “Fireside Travels,” “Among my Books,” and “My Study Windows.” He would be a bold critic to-day who would undertake to set forth his views of men and books in the form of conversations or letters. The beginning of these conversations seems to belong to the eighteenth century rather than to the nineteenth:

John.—Here you are, I see, as usual, ramparted around with musty volumes of the old poets. I remember how you used to pore over them in the college library. Are you not afraid that the wheels of your mind will get choked with the dust that rises out of these dry mummy-pits?

Philip.—Even if I were to allow the justice of your last metaphor, I could reply, that the dust is at least that of kings. You must remember, also, that even this dust is not without its uses. The rich brown pigment which our painters use is made out of it;—another material illustration of the spiritual truth, that nothing which ever had a meaning for mankind loses it by the lapse of years.

Is not this from “Conversations on Personal Religion,” asks the modern reader who has read the book thus far? Not at all, for in the very next sentence John makes a remark worthy of the later Lowell: “Our modern poets seem fully aware of the fact, that what is true of one art is true also of all the others. They are as fond of using this coloring, made out of dead men’s bones, as the painters. One must be turning at every other stanza to his glossary, in order to understand them, so full are they of archaisms. They seem to have plagiarized from the cheese-mongers, who inoculate their new cheeses with a bit of mould, to give them the flavor of old ones.” This, written in the days of the early Tennyson, seems like a prophecy of Morris and Rossetti. It is as true and as effective as a bit from the author’s later critical essays, which it also resembles in its use of a culinary metaphor, always a favorite means of illustration in the author's books. Equally good, and applicable to many questions affecting the originality of American literature, is Philip's reply: "An imitation of style is one thing; the use of the same material is quite another. The marble of Pentelicus may be carved into other shapes as noble as the Phœbus or the Jupiter. It has no prejudice in favor of the Greek mythology; and Hiram Powers, I fancy, can persuade it to look god-like even in a coat and pantaloons. Language is the marble in which the poet carves; and, if he find that which the old poets used aptest to his hand, let him not mar his work from an idle prejudice in favor of the quarries of Berkshire or Vermont."

This is the beginning of the first of two conversations on Chaucer; the two remaining conversations are devoted to the old English dramatists, chiefly to Chapman and Ford. Everywhere is evidence of Lowell's familiarity with authors not generally known when he wrote; and his discussions often take up kindred themes all along the history of literature. Whether he was consciously influenced by Landor I do not know; but some of these criticisms have a Landorian touch, with much else, distinctly American. In reading them, Lamb's notes on the Elizabethan dramatists would occur to the mind, of course, even if Lowell did not occasionally mention them; but there is nothing save sympathy in common between him and his famous predecessor. Lowell's estimates are his own; and though, when he speaks of Chapman's essentially dull and imperfect dramas, he seems to use too laudatory language, his praise does not rise to Lamb's extravagant heights. Neither Chapman nor Ford was commonly known in America in 1844; indeed, the first complete edition of Chapman's plays was not printed in London until 1873; so that Lowell's accounts performed, for American readers, a service similar to that done in England by the old Retrospective Review. Some general culture was also imparted meanwhile; let us not forget that, even as late as forty years ago, the country was in real need of literary instruction. A second series of these "Conversations" was planned but never written; though the work was virtually continued in the author's later criticisms printed in The North American Review and The Atlantic Monthly, and reissued in his last three volumes of prose.

Lowell's literary life has always been connected with the higher periodical press; in 1843, when four years out of college, he edited, with Robert Carter, a monthly magazine called The Pioneer, which died after three numbers. Nothing but honor, however, should be bestowed upon a young writer who, at twenty-four, could edit a magazine, a single issue of which could proffer such a list of original articles as that in the number for February, 1843. Here are "The Hall of Fantasy," by Nathaniel Hawthorne; Lenore, by Edgar Allan Poe; "Song-Writing," by James R. Lowell; "To M. O. S.," by the same; and "Lines Written in the Book of a Friend," by J. G. Whittier; besides contributions from J. S. Dwight, John Neal, and T. W. Parsons. Surely American literature in the true sense was in existence, though the fact was not known to all, hardly to Hawthorne, Whittier, Poe, and Lowell themselves. The next, and final, number of The Pioneer offered, among other things, "The Birthmark," by Hawthorne, "Notes upon English Verse," by Poe, and "The Maiden's Death," by Elizabeth B. Barrett, author of "The Seraphim," etc. "After this creditable beginning of editorial work, Mr. Lowell more than once continued to labor regularly in the field of periodical literature, first as editor of The Atlantic Monthly, and afterwards as one of the conductors of The North American Review. To the pages of those well-known Boston periodicals, as has been stated, he contributed, with or without his name, most of the papers upon which his critical reputation rests. A good part of the volume called "Fireside Travels" (1864) had first appeared in Putnam's Monthly, New York, founded and at first edited by Lowell's lifelong friend, Charles Frederick Briggs, to whom he dedicated "A Fable for Critics," and one of the two volumes of the first collected edition of his poems. This "Fireside Travels" book, with its humorous description of a trip to Moosehead Lake, its gentle reminiscences of the Cambridge of the author's youth, etc., belongs to the division of miscellaneous essays, rather than to that of criticism. It is a pleasant book, making modest claims, and fulfilling them.

Lowell's critical writings, so far as he cares to pre-serve them, are contained in the first and second series of "Among my Books" (1870 and 1875), and "My Study Windows," (1871). The three volumes are practically a single work, though, the last-named contains several miscellaneous and shorter papers. Summarizing them by topics, that we may compare their range with that of the critical writings of Longfellow and Poe, we find a range broader and a quantity much greater than in Longfellow's similar work ; and, as against Poe's, a broader range and a quantity about equal. Lowell turns to old English literature with a zest not shared by either of these his contemporaries, and predecessors in critical writing. Thus, in English literature alone he writes of Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden, Pope, Wordsworth, Keats, Carlyle, and Swinburne ; while in the American division we have an analysis of Puritan character and of witchcraft, besides essays on Emerson, Thoreau, James Gates Percival, Josiah Quincy (president of Harvard), and Abraham Lincoln. Germany is represented by Lessing, France by Rousseau, and Italy by Dante ; and if we add to this choice catalogue such essays as " My Garden Acquaintance," " A Good Word for Winter," and the one entitled, " On a Certain Condescension in Foreigners," we perceive the breadth and value of the writer's work, for we know, in advance, that he has something to say, and can say it wisely and wittily.

In these papers it is evident that the author possesses the catholic taste, the power of insight, and the originality and independence of utterance which should characterize the true critic. In such a case as that of Thoreau, for instance, he sharply combats the prevalent idea concerning the writings of the author in question. No such keen analysis of Tho-reau's defective character had been made in a circle which, despite its commanding place in American literature, was, in fact, somewhat obnoxious to Poe's old charge of mutual-admirationism. Sympathy and wit combine in the review of the young Swinburne's tragedies, in the notices of various writers included in the Library of Old Authors, and in the discussions of Chaucer, Pope, and Shakespeare. Some years since, an industrious and acute writer, in a series of papers on Mr. Lowell's prose, subjected these volumes to minutely searching tests. His aim was to prove that their author was frequently inconsistent; that, notwithstanding his scholarly equipment, his place in a college faculty, and his fondness for verbal discussions, he was sometimes inelegant or even ungrammatical; and that he too often introduced illustrations or collateral statements that were confusing, non-pertinent, and ungraceful. I must say that it seems to me that Dr. Wilkinson, this critic of a critic, made out his case. But the reader of Lowell, though he admit all that was charged, finds his pleasure little diminished. The very faults named are results of Lowell's mental alertness, and wit not easily kept within limits. Rude and homely as his illustrations sometimes are, at least they illustrate. As for consistency, all great authors approximate toward it, but do not reach it. Emerson refuses to be "the slave of his yesterdays"; and Walt Whitman, in one of his best mots, declares: "You say I am not consistent with myself; very well, I am not consistent with myself." Lowell the critic, like Lowell the poet, has moods, and now emphasizes one side of the statue, now the other ; but of the essential unity and helpful work of his critical writings there can be little question.

Are citations desirable, that his merits, defects, and limits may be made more clear? His essays do not furnish nuggets of gold, like Carlyle's ; philosophic dicta, like Emerson's ; brilliant antitheses, like Macaulay's. Nor does one greatly surpass another—save that the youthful " Conversations on the Old Poets " are inferior to the maturer volumes. The sum and nature of Lowell's critical writing are as fairly indicated by some of his latest words as by the re-reading of his series of prose works. He is speaking of the general theme of most of his essays, namely, of books : *

Lowell on literature.

The riches of scholarship, the benignities of literature, defy fortune and outlive calamity. They are beyond the reach of thief or moth or rust. As they cannot be inherited, so they cannot be alienated. But they may be shared, they may be distributed, and it is the object and office of a free public library to perform these beneficent functions.

" Books," says Wordsworth, " are a real world," and he was thinking, doubtless, of such books as are not merely the triumphs of pure intellect, however supreme, but of those in which intellect infused with the sense of beauty aims rather to produce delight than conviction, or, if conviction, then through intuition rather than formal logic, and, leaving what Donne wisely calls—for which the outward and visible world serves at best but as the husk and symbol. Am I wrong in using the word realities? wrong in insisting on the distinction between the real and the actual? in assuming for the ideal an existence as absolute and self-subsistent as that which appeals to our senses, nay, so often cheats them, in the matter of fact? How very small a part of the world we truly live in is represented by what speaks to us through the senses, when compared with that vast realm of the mind which is peopled by memory and imagination and with such shining inhabitants! These walls, these faces, what are they in comparison with the countless images, the innumerable population which every one of us can summon up to the tiny show-box of the brain, in material breadth scarce a span, yet infinite as space and time? And in what, I pray, are these we gravely call historical characters, of which each new historian strains his neck to get a new and different view, in any sense more real than the personages of fiction? Do not serious and earnest men discuss Hamlet as they would Cromwell or Lincoln? Does Cæsar, does Alaric hold existence by any other or stronger tenure than the Christian of Bunyan or the Don Quixote of Cervantes or the Antigone of Sophocles? Is not the history which is luminous because of an indwelling and perennial truth to nature, because of that light which never was, on land or sea, really more true, in the highest sense, than many a weary chronicle with names, date, and place, in which "an Amurath to Amurath succeeds"? Do we know as much of any authentic Danish prince as of Hamlet? . . .

Have you ever rightly considered what the mere ability to read means? That it is the key that admits us to the whole world of thought and fancy and imagination; to the company of saint and sage, of the wisest and the wittiest at their wisest and wittiest moment? That it enables us to see with the keenest eyes, hear with the finest ears, and listen to the sweetest voices of all time?

More than that, it annihilates time and space for us; it revives for us without a miracle the Age of Wonder, endowing us with the shoes of swiftness and the cap of darkness, so that we walk invisible like fern seed and witness unharmed the plague at Athens or Florence or London; accompanying Cæsar on his marches, or look in on Catiline in council with his fellow conspirators, or Guy Fawkes in the cellar of St. Stephen's. We often hear of people who will descend to any servility, submit to any insult, for the sake of getting themselves or their children into what is euphemistically called good society. Did it ever occur to them that there is a select society of all the centuries to which they and theirs can be admitted for the asking—a society, too, which will not involve them in ruinous expense and still more ruinous waste of time and health and faculties?

Southey tells us that, in his walk one stormy day, he met an old woman, to whom, by way of greeting, he made the rather obvious remark that it was dreadful weather. She answered, philosophically, that, in her opinion, "any weather was better than none!" I should be half inclined to say that any reading was better than none, allaying the crudeness of the statement by the Yankee proverb, which tells us that, though "all deacons are good, there 's odds in deacons." Among books, certainly there is much variety of company, ranging from the best to the worst, from Plato to Zola, and the first lesson in reading well is that which teaches us to distinguish between literature and merely printed matter. The choice lies wholly with ourselves. We have the key put into our hands; shall we unlock the pantry or the oratory? There is a Wallachian legend which, like most of the figments of popular fancy, has a moral in it. One Bakála, a good-for-nothing kind of fellow in his way, having had the luck to offer a sacrifice especially well pleasing to God, is taken up into heaven. He finds the Almighty sitting in something like the best room of a phrase that characterizes them. They were scholars, because they did not read so many things as we. They had fewer books, but these were of the best. Their speech was noble, because they lunched with Plutarch and supped with Plato. We spend as much time over print as they did, but instead of communing with the choice thoughts of choice spirits, and unconsciously acquiring the grand manner of that supreme society, we diligently inform ourselves, and cover the continent with a network of speaking wires to inform us, of such inspiring facts as that a horse belonging to Mr. Smith ran away on Wednesday, seriously damaging a valuable carryall; that a son of Mr. Brown swallowed a hickory-nut on Thursday; and that a gravel bank caved in and buried Mr. Robinson alive on Friday. Alas, it is we ourselves that are getting buried alive under this avalanche of earthy impertinences! It is we who, while we might each in his humble way be helping our fellows into the right path, or adding one block to the climbing spire of a fine soul, are willing to become mere sponges saturated from the stagnant goose-pond of village gossip.

Wallachian peasant's cottage—there is always something profoundly pathetic in the homeliness of the popular imagination, forced, like the princess in the fairy tale, to weave its semblance of gold tissue out of straw. On being asked what reward he desires for the good service he has done, Bakála, who had always passionately longed to be the owner of a bagpipe, seeing a half-worn-out one lying among some rubbish in a corner of the room, begs eagerly that it may be bestowed on him. The Lord, with a smile of pity at the meanness of his choice, grants him his boon, and Bakála goes back to earth delighted with his prize. With an infinite possibility within his reach, with the choice of wisdom, of power, of beauty at his tongue's end, he asked according to his kind, and his sordid wish is answered with a gift as sordid. Yes, there is a choice in books as in friends, and the mind sinks or rises to the level of its habitual society—is subdued, as Shakespeare says of the dyer's hand, to what it works in. Cato's advice, cum bonis ambula, consort with the good, is quite as true if we extend it to books, for they, too, insensibly give away their own nature to the mind that converses with them. They either beckon upwards or drag down. And it is certainly true that the material of thought reacts upon the thought itself. Shakespeare himself would have been commonplace had he been padded in a thinly shaven vocabulary; and Phidias, had he worked in wax, only a more inspired Mrs. Jarley. A man is known, says the proverb, by the company he keeps, and not only so, but made by it. Milton makes his fallen angels grow small to enter the infernal council-room, but the soul, which God meant to be the spacious chamber where high thoughts and generous aspirations might commune together, shrinks and narrows itself to the measure of the meaner company that is wont to gather there, hatching conspiracies against our better selves. We are apt to wonder at the scholarship of the men of three centuries ago, and at a certain dignity of

One is sometimes asked by young people to recommend a course of reading. My advice would be that they should confine themselves to the supreme books in whatever literature, or, still better, to choose some one great author, and make themselves thoroughly familiar with him. For, as all roads lead to Rome, so do they likewise lead away from it, and you will find that, in order to understand perfectly and weigh exactly any vital piece of literature, you will be gradually and pleasantly persuaded to excursions and explorations of which you little dreamed when you began, and will find yourselves scholars before you are aware. For, remember that there is nothing less profitable than scholarship for the mere sake of scholarship, nor any thing more wearisome in the attainment. But the moment you have a definite aim, attention is quickened—the mother of memory—and all that you acquire groups and arranges itself in an order that is lucid, because everywhere and always it is in intelligent relation to a central object of constant and growing interest. This method also forces upon us the necessity of thinking, which is, after all, the highest result of all education. For what we want is not learning, but knowledge; that is, the power to make learning answer its true end as a quickener of intelligence, and a widener of our intellectual sympathies.

I have quoted at length these incisive words, not to illustrate anew the breadth of Lowell's range—from Shakespeare to the daily newspaper, from Plato to Cervantes, from Bunyan to Zola;—but rather to show how, in a manner characteristic of Anglo-Saxon New England, all this learning and wit, all this service to books and culture, is also made a service to the American commonweal. “Is not American public spirit,” says Mr. Lowell, in conclusion, “a natural evolution from that frame of mind in which New England was colonized, and which found expression in these grave words of Robinson and Brewster: ‘We are knit together as a body in a most strict and sacred bond and covenant of the Lord, of the violation of which we make great conscience, and by virtue whereof we hold ourselves strictly tied to all care of each other's good, and of the whole.’ Let us never forget the deep and solemn import of these words. The problem before us is to make a whole of our many discordant parts, and I know of no way in which this can be better done than by providing a common system of education, and a common door of access to the best books by which that education may be continued, broadened, and made fruitful. For it is certain that, whatever we do or leave undone, those discordant parts and foreign elements are to be, whether we will or no, members of that body which Robinson and Brewster had in mind, bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, for good or ill."

Some such general purpose as this, so well stated by Lowell, is all that the American literary critic can set before him. To spread culture, or to aid learning in some especial field, must be his mission. American criticism is not yet so old or so wide-reaching as to boast any conspicuous "schools." Those who contribute to this division of intellectual labor must, to a large extent, follow individual lines of preference and learning. This isolation of American critics is, on the whole, a decided advantage. Indeed, in the general field of American literature there is hardly a "school," save that of which Emerson is the recognized head. A certain similarity of purpose and plan bound together Emerson and the lesser Transcendentalists who wrote for the pages of The Dial magazine. But in criticism this similarity was not very great. They liked Goethe and Carlyle, they preferred subjective literature to objective, and they hailed any marked manifestation of the "time-spirit" in its more ideal exhibitions. The general attitude of Amos Bronson Alcott toward books and literature has been substantially that of Emerson. In the various works of this kindly man are many valuable characterizations and analyses of books and their authors. Alcott, like Southey, is a lover of books as well as a student of them, and the appreciation of discriminated books has no better illustration than in the various passages in his writings. In the volumes written by Mr. Alcott, and gathered from manuscript years after the pages were penned,—in his “Tablets,” “Concord Days,” “Records of a School,” and other reported conversations,—we find the discursive method of Emerson carried one step further, and note a sententiousness and an eccentricity and an obscurity which seem more marked than the corresponding qualities in Emerson himself. Mr. Alcott has been, by conviction and by profession, a talker; his conversations, held for many years in various states, have been his own in method and achievement. Much of their strength has vanished with the spoken word; not a little remains in his heterogeneous volumes, on life, duty, the environment, philosophy, religion, immortality. Their critical parts expound by insight and quick “oracular” utterance, and the literary seed sown broadcast by this quaint and kindly teacher has often fallen on fertile soil.

Two other writers, critics by profession, bore the Concord Transcendental influence out into the world.

George Ripley, 1802-1880. Emerson the lecturer, in his comments on “Representative Men,” in his addresses on John Brown, Thoreau, Lincoln, or other contemporaries, or in his studies of “English Traits,” was of course possessed of the critical faculty, and was ever loyal to the principles which his Brook Farm admirers or Concord disciples professed. Hawthorne, with his insight, sympathy, humor, and breadth of thought, was sometimes a critical observer whom one might reverence or fear. But book-reviewing was of course far from the literary aims of either Emerson or Hawthorne, neither of whom set the critical faculty before him as the leading influence in his life-work. Hawthorne's aloofness made him an observer at Concord—even of Emerson—rather than a promoter of Concord principles as applied to criticism, philosophy, and life. Mr. Alcott's serene life was spent in unworldly studies in Concord itself or in holding "conversations" untrammelled by the choice of subject, or the method of treatment, by which the professional critic must so often be limited. This or that young man who had early shared the influences and enthusiasms of Concord and Brook Farm, which the critic Lowell had studied at a safe distance, went out into the world, like George William Curtis or Charles A. Dana, and found his early life but a cheering memory or a faded dream. It was reserved for two of those who had felt and shared the New England Transcendental renaissance to continue to apply its leading principles to literary work, chiefly in a critical line. These two were George Ripley and Margaret Fuller.

The long career of George Ripley was certainly a curious one, and one hardly likely to be paralleled in another country than America, or in America at another period. Born in 1802, within the decade which gave American literature so many names destined to be famous, Ripley duly graduated at Harvard College and its divinity school, according to the fashion in vogue among not a few of the bright young men of Massachusetts. Like Emerson, he preached in a Boston Unitarian church for a few years, displaying increasingly radical tendencies. Afterwards he travelled in Europe; familiarized himself with French and German literature when Germany was beginning to affect English and American thought; and edited, and thereby popularized, quite a library of translated specimens of foreign standard literature. He also shared in the writing of the controversial theological books which were so numerous in Massachusetts between 1820 and 1840; was an editor of The Dial; and was next the leading spirit in the Brook Farm community at West Roxbury, until its preconcerted death in 1846. For nearly a quarter of a century he had been active in religious, philosophical, and socialistic work in Boston and its vicinity, without leaving behind him any lasting results in church, community, or literature. Next, at the age of forty-five, he removed to New York and became associated with Horace Greeley in the conduct of the New York Tribune. The atmosphere of the office was congenial; Fourierite and other advanced religious, social, and political principles were welcomed or perhaps advocated by more than one of the conductors of the famous newspaper; and the very reasons that gave Dr. Ripley his place also gave him freedom in expressing his opinions. Then began his uninterrupted service to the Tribune as literary editor, until the time of his death in 1880. For thirty-three years, in the most productive period in the history of American literature, he wrote criticisms on hundreds and thousands of books, passing in procession before his eye. American "book-reviewing" can show no parallel record of faithful service for a third of a century ; and the influence exerted by Dr. Ripley was naturally great. To many readers he still seems the one American critic, by reason of seniority, and perhaps by reason of quality of work. One of the more conspicuous of American contemporary men of letters, himself critic as well as poet, expresses his sense of Dr. Ripley's services toward his country's literature by offering a volume, in sincere dedicatory compliment, "to George Ripley, LL.D., whose judgment, learning, and professional devotion have contributed to the advancement of criticism, and furnished an enviable example to men of letters."

And yet, it seems to me, one can hardly assign to this veteran American critic a high or permanent place in our literary history. He was equipped with a wide knowledge, including philosophy and theology, as well as belles-lettres; contemporary European literature was familiar to him ; his tastes and sympathies were, as a rule, both kindly and catholic ; he had few hobbies to ride or rancors to exhibit ; no trace of embittering personal disappointment appeared in his reviews ; and he did not yield, so far as I know, to individual dislikes or petty spites. But his critical work could not be compared, in merit, with that of such an essayist as Mr. Lowell, nor with the unsigned and unrecognized reviews of some less known writers. It lacked grasp ; the points Dr. Ripley sought to make must be found by the reader at some cost of time and trouble. His writing was, as a rule, diffuse ; terse or remarkable characterizations were lacking; nor did one often find a sentence that went straight to the heart of a book. Dr. Ripley was considered to have an unusual ability as a summarizer of the books he reviewed, but summarizing, by paraphrase or by scissors-work, is the easiest kind of criticism. Again, his use of adjectives was sometimes deemed a merit; but these adjectives were generally used to round out a style perpetually "balanced" or Johnsonian. The writer evidently sought to leave an impression of profundity and nice analytical power; but this impression was produced upon those who delighted in the literary habit of saying that, though B follows A in the alphabet, it undoubtedly precedes C. Dr. Ripley's reviews, as a rule, could have been divided into parallel columns, each sentence separated into halves by such words as but, yet, though, notwithstanding. It hardly seems a gracious task, certainly it is not a pleasant one, to point out the essential hollowness of one who, for so long a time, seemed the "Nestor of American criticism"; but it is time to try to be impartial, if we would be historical. The very qualities of mind which led to Dr. Ripley's failure to influence deeply the religious state of Boston and to perpetuate the work of Transcendentalism or Brook-Farmism, also caused his critical work to be transient in influence and somewhat superficial in character. None of his books—his successful editing of the sixteen-volume American Cyclopædia of course does not disprove the statement—shows by theme or by execution the original and forceful character of a creative mind. He never wrote his projected intellectual history of New England, which, if completed, would have possessed valuable qualities; for Dr. Ripley could truly have said pars magna fui, at least of the Unitarian and Transcendental movements. His best service to American literature was his kindly encouragement by criticisms which, above all things, disliked to be severe, in years when the literature of the country perhaps still needed stimulus toward a more active development. This service received during Dr. Ripley's lifetime, and should receive here, the honorable mention it deserves. It should also be said that in the somewhat brief and unfruitful history of American criticism, this writer, occupying a place of prominence, aided the development of that criticism by a serene and evenly poised mental habit, a habit none too common in a young literature.

It not infrequently happens, in these days of widely diffused knowledge, and of multiplied opportunities for intellectual labor, that a potent influence upon thought is exercised by men and women who produce no volumes of importance. Such influences, as a rule, should not be noted, or at any rate described at length, in a history of literature. Yet, in tracing the development of a thing so recent as the literature of the United States, we would go astray did we refuse to recognize and study some influences which affected the intellectual growth of the nation, though not taking permanent form within the covers of bound volumes of the highest class. Of the influence exerted by Dr. Ripley, who did not write a single book of high rank, I have just spoken. Equally notable, though less prolonged, was that exerted by Margaret Fuller, like Ripley first a Transcendentalist, then a worker for the New York Tribune. From The Dial to a daily newspaper seems a long step; but the work of Ripley and Miss Fuller was aided by their willingness to earn a living in an honorable employment, and therein to spread more widely some of the principles they had advocated in a circle of the Transcendental elect. Few, nowadays, read the "works" of Margaret Fuller: her translation of "Eckermann's Conversations with Goethe," her unimportant "Summer on the Lakes," her more ambitious papers on "Art and Literature," or her principal book, "Woman in the Nineteenth Century." We cannot say that these papers have fallen out of public notice because they were collected from the pages of periodicals; surely a previous publication did not deter the public of book-readers from the writings of Emerson or Lowell, Carlyle or Macaulay. Nor can it be said that Miss Fuller's writing was of inferior merit, for some of it surpassed in value the essays and criticisms of Poe, for instance, and equalled a part of Channing's literary product. Friendly eulogists have striven to keep her character and work before the public eye; not many have been so fortunate as to be commemorated by the pen of Emerson, not to enumerate all her lesser and later biographers. In addition to this, readers of Hawthorne cannot fail to see that certain elements in the character of Zenobia, in "The Blithe-dale Romance," correspond with some of Miss Fuller's, though, of course, it would be careless to aver that Zenobia was Margaret Fuller. Great romancers are not so clumsy as to introduce real personages into their pages, without many touches and idealizing changes.

Yet, after all that has been said of Miss Fuller by her many earnest friends, after the zealous and sometimes unseemly criticisms and defences of which she has been the subject, and after the fullest recognition of her merits, faults, and foibles, her personality and the memory of her influence are the things that interest us, not the present value of her printed pages. Her learned girlhood, her solitary ways, and her burning zeal, remind us of Mrs. Browning. As Mrs. Browning's name is first among women who have contributed to English literature, so the name of Margaret Fuller is practically the first to show the position woman has already begun to take, and must make more and more conspicuous, in the literature of America. She could understand, share, and spread the philosophical, religious, and literary opinions of Emerson; she could edit The Dial, the magazine in which the Transcendental spirit took form; she could rival Alcott as a leader of conversation; she could aid in the excellent movement for the popularization of German literature in America; she could prove "woman's right to labor" in the exacting toils of newspaper writing; and at last she could throw herself, heart and soul, into the early struggles toward Italian unity and freedom, in 1848 and the following years. The parallel between Margaret Fuller and Mrs. Browning, begun in school-girl days, was continued on Italian soil; but not in the tragic water-death of the brave and wayward American. Margaret Fuller had married in Italy, late in 1847, a Marquis Giovanni Angelo Ossoli, of whose character the conflicting accounts need not be discussed here; she had worked for his country with pen and hand, at the desk and in the hospital; she had been a trusted associate of Mazzini in his labor and ambition; and she had written a chronicle of some of the scenes she had beheld and shared. Her life ended, with that of her family, in a shipwreck on the American coast, within a day's sail of home, in 1850. She had done and she had been; what she did and was we cannot forget, though we read not her books, but those of women who followed her, and who were helped toward intellectual freedom and toward the fields of literature by her pioneer toils.

“Pioneer toils”—the phrase might as well be applied to the greater part of American critical writing up to the present day. A body of critics cannot be recruited in any country while that country still lacks a literature considerable in quantity and quality. Longfellow, in his miscellaneous prose, therefore assumed the work of an instructor. One could not ask that didacticism should be more courteously and attractively veiled than in his critical essays on European literature; but it was didacticism, all the same. He was writing for the instruction of a people which included a growing number of eager learners, but which was, for the most part, profoundly ignorant of the subjects discussed. Take, for instance, the charming and still-helpful essay on Anglo-Saxon literature. At the time of its publication there were not five men in New England who could read the Anglo-Saxon alphabet. American literary criticism had to do work even more elementary than that which fell to the lot of American scholarship. Had the little knots of men of culture, here and there throughout the United States, rested content with their own attainments, they would have ignored the duty that plainly called them, and would also have increased their own discomforts. Poe, in criticism, was an iconoclast as well as a propagandist. He ruthlessly overthrew some of the literary humbugs of his time. A recent critic has applied this severe term to Poe himself; but there is in his work enough genius to save it forever. Not so with the books of the ladies and gentlemen whom he was discussing. While Longfellow was explaining and commending the good, Poe was, in his irregular way, denouncing the pretentious and bad, in an ex-cathedra manner that was as harsh as Longfellow's was gentle. The work of public instruction is not so manifest, nor so much needed, in Lowell's critical writing, which has a depth and value not to be found in Ripley's or Margaret Fuller's; but the result is still that sought by the literary teacher, and Lowell's methods are consciously didactic, though not always apparently so.

work of other, later, and younger American critics. Save where they have written for and with European specialists of equal standing, they have necessarily joined instruction with discussion, description with analysis. Herein lies the value of the work of Edwin Percy Whipple, through many Edwin Percy years. Because of this position of the Whipple, 1819-1886. American critic and essayist, during the last half-century, Whipple, like Lowell, did not confine himself to purely literary themes. He broadly discussed "Literature and Life" (the title of one of his volumes); studied "Character and Characteristic Men," and "Success and its Conditions," in many times and lands; and ranged from "The Literature of the Age of Elizabeth" to "Washington and the Principles of the Revolution," or to "Daniel Webster and Rufus Choate." With the exception of Richard Grant White, Whipple is the only writer considered in this chapter who made criticism his profession and life-work; even Mr. White's livelihood was otherwise earned, and musical criticism, as well as literary, occupied him. Whipple showed that the time had come to study books and men; to analyze character and purpose, especially in literature; and to discuss the causes and nature of literary and personal failures and successes. For this task no little discretion was required, when, in 1843, Whipple began his active work as a writer, in an article on "Macaulay." As a reviewer and lecturer, Whipple reached a public which Emerson never fully influenced; though his service in emphasizing the value and strength of true character was in Emerson's own vein. Whipple showed his Americanism by the emphasis laid upon that element of character he called grit; and he displayed his Saxon temper in his unmitigated contempt for sham and shoddy.

A considerable part of Whipple's critical writing originally appeared in The North American Review. The relations of that periodical to the history of critical thought in America are not to be overlooked, as regards the length and the character of its service. It was started in 1815, thirteen years after The Edinburgh Review and six years after The Quarterly Review. A critical review must have behind it a scholarly group, and such the North American had in the Boston gentlemen who had formed the "Anthology Club," intimately connected with a magazine called The Monthly Anthology. From 1815, for sixty years, though receiving some contributions from other parts of the country, the North American practically represented the culture which centred in Boston and Cambridge. Successive editors were William Tudor, Willard Phillips, Edward Tyrrel Channing, Richard Henry Dana, Senior, Edward Everett, Jared Sparks, Alexander H. Everett, Francis Bowen, Andrew P. Peabody, James Russell Lowell, Charles Eliot Norton, and Henry Adams. These Boston and Cambridge men wrote much for the Review, a single individual sometimes contributing several papers to a number. Culture and critical spirit certainly existed in a land and in a time when a single periodical could print articles by such representative men as Everett, Sparks, and Lowell, among its editors, and Irving, Prescott, Bancroft, Motley, Parkman, Emerson, Longfellow, Holmes, and Curtis among its contributors. Their work may fairly enough be said, in the words of a later editor of the Review, to "represent the growth of native thought and scholarship in the United States from the close of the second war with Great Britain down to the close of the great civil war."

The North American, previous to its abandonment of its review character, and its assumption of its present function, that of offering a monthly batch of valuable or sensational signed pamphlets by noted men, varied in its excellence during its several decades of history. A periodical issued for more than half a century could hardly be expected, under many editors, to be of uniform value. Again, it certainly was, for the greater part of its career, the organ of a school which, in religion, society, politics, education, etc., was somewhat open to the charge of narrowness, despite its evident ability. The North American looked at life and letters from beneath the shade of Harvard University, the Boston State-house, or the Boston Athenæum. Even the neighboring Concord was out of its latitude, and therefore was judged from an alien and not wholly friendly point of view. But this shade, if shade it was, fell from trees that grew from a soil more truly academic and fertile, at that time, than any other the country could show. The insularity of the North American, or its representative function in behalf of a limited school, was certainly no greater than that of either of its English prototypes, the one in Edinburgh or the one in London. It received literary products, and by printing and publishing them it furthered new results in its own field and elsewhere. Recognizing all its deficiencies, one may fairly say that the North American, on the whole, was both creditable and beneficial to American literature, almost from those early days when, in its original magazine capacity, it published Bryant's "Thanatopsis." Its book reviews, in particular, were better, between 1850 and 1870, than any regularly printed in any other American periodical. When criticism of this sort becomes excellent, one may be quite sure that it indicates the existence of an excellent general literature, near at hand.

Longfellow and Lowell were Harvard professors; Longfellow had previously held a chair in Bowdoin, a New England college of similar literary tone; Whipple was a Bostonian; Alcott ^{New York as a literary centre.} a Concord man; and the North American thoroughly local. But when Ripley and Margaret Fuller went from Massachusetts to New York, where Poe was already at work, they signified the change, still in progress, whereby New York was to become the literary distributing centre of America, though not its literary capital, in the London or Paris sense. There Grant White, Bayard Taylor, Stoddard, and Stedman were to work in the critical field, finding in magazines and in daily newspapers a regular channel for their prose. Their criticisms, and, indeed, the hack work from which the man of letters can seldom be free, did not deter Taylor, Stoddard, and Stedman from poetical composition. The divine was not lost to sight; Stedman, indeed, could find "Pan in Wall Street," and Taylor's facility could turn readily from a newspaper letter, report, or review, to a "Masque of the Gods." It was this facility which made Taylor traveler, lecturer, novelist, and newspaper man, as well as diplomat, poet, or critic; and he paid the penalty of facility even more surely than did poverty-stricken Hood or graceful Leigh Hunt. Good in all, he was supreme in none, though in poetry he was—as will be seen in a later volume of this work—almost successful in the best sense. His great "Life of Goethe" was never written; he never undertook the "History of American Literature," which his hearty and winsome personal friendships would perhaps have biassed; his valuable lectures on the Niebelungenlied, Lessing, Schiller, Goethe, Richter, and other German writers, were printed, without his designed revision, as elementary and necessarily popular "Studies in German Literature"; and the "Notes on Books and Events," which form a part of the volume called "Essays and Notes," are merely such gleanings as could be made from a thoroughly competent journalist's daily work. Admirable sometimes, well-written always, they are less partisan than Poe's, and they deal with greater authors and better books; but they are less significant, because they

There is help if the heavens have one ” ;

though the life-work of this attractive personality and clever writer shrink to “ The Masque of the Gods ” alone, that poem would keep for him a place in our true literature. And in the single department of criticism I venture to claim for Taylor’s “ The Echo Club, and other Literary Diversions,” notwithstanding its strange failure to win general notice, the place which belongs to the best collection of parodies written within the past half-century, and the best semi-humorous critical work in our literature, save “ A Fable for Critics.” He who would question so favorable an opinion, may read or re-read the rhymed review of Browning’s “ Inn Album ” (p. 175), or “ The Promissory Note ” (p. 22), in parody of Poe.

The prose writings of R. H. Stoddard are widely scattered, and never have been winnowed and brought into collected form. They must be sought in the introductory pages of the many books he has edited : collections of English and American verse, libraries of ana or literary reminiscence, or new editions of the works of standard authors. Much of his critical work lies buried still more deeply in the files of the New York dailies, which he has served as literary editor. With an unusual acquaintance with the whole body of English and American poetry, Stoddard has been content to promote the increasing literary culture of his time, by work seemingly desultory and occasional, but in reality unremitting. I consider the best representative of his literary knowledge, critical ability, and impartiality to be the two-hundred-page introduction to the 1884 edition of Poe's works.

Richard Grant White, though at times a journal-Richard Grant White, 1822-1885. ist, like all the other New York critics, Poe, Taylor, Stoddard, and Stedman, wrote for the most part in the slower manner befitting magazine essays. From Putnam's Monthly, The Galaxy, or The Atlantic Monthly were slowly collected the materials afterwards reshaped in his books: "Shakespeare's Scholar," "The Life and Genius of Shakespeare," "Studies in Shakespeare," "Words and their Uses," "Every-day English," "England Without and Within." White's faults as a critic were a severity sometimes amounting to ill-nature; an egotistic self-assertion that was unjust to his opponents; an inability to state fairly the other side of a question; a fondness for petty discussion; and an occasional prolixity. As a writer on Shakespeare and an editor of his works, he dwelt with increasing and one-sided force upon the defects of Shakespeare's personality, until the puzzled reader wondered how Hamlet or Juliet could be evoked from the brain of so mean a man. But White exposed and shamed many pretentious ignoramuses, Shakespearean and other; he ridiculed and routed the wretched crew of annotators, "conjectural" readers, and forgers of text; and he made very clear (especially in "The Life and Genius of Shakespeare," vol. I. of the twelve-volume edition) the true and the false in the Shakespeare life-legend. Not a philologist himself, he promoted the study of the forms and uses of words; and in general he performed a sound service to American criticism by his very cynicism and coldness. Here was a writer who could sharply challenge sentimentality and half-knowledge, within his particular field. His notes on England are much inferior to Hawthorne's or Emerson's, both in description and in analysis; and his one novel, portentously called "The Fate of Mansfield Humphreys; with the Episode of Mr. Washington Adams in England, and an Apology," is a laughable failure.

Obvious considerations might deter a historian of American literature from discussing the work and the relative rank of contemporary writers in the same historical field. I do not mean, only, that the difficulty and delicacy of criticism of living writers would be greatly augmented in such a task; that praise might seem, to the careless reader, to be the puffery of mutual-admiration; or that blame might appear, in the minds of those prejudiced to suspicion, to spring from prejudice. I have undoubtedly exposed myself already to such charges, as must every one who honestly attempts to write of the books of living authors, however sincere his desire to be just. It is enough to say that only one completed American literary history, on a large scale, as yet exists. Professor Tyler's "History of American Literature," much of which I would heartily praise, is still so incomplete that it cannot justly be reviewed in the pages of a collateral work ; and other able writers have made but fragmentary contributions to the general theme. I must pass by, therefore, the names of some who have written well or ill, laboriously or superficially, upon topics discussed in these pages. Edmund Clarence Stedman must be mentioned, however, for reasons relating to the history of American literature. The publication of Stedman's "Victorian Poets," in 1875, and "Poets of America," in 1885, marked, it seems to me, a period in the literary progress of the country. One critical reader may honestly differ from another ; and thus it seems to me that Mr. Stedman's estimate of certain authors, of Landor, Procter, Swinburne, Whitman, or Bayard Taylor, is far too high ; and that he has partly failed to indicate our emergence from colonialism and provincialism, by his too kindly insertion of many names of little rhymers and "poetesses" who are beginning to be covered by the cloud of oblivion, or who have never emerged from obscurity. But in his two books, closely connected with each other, and covering the same period, we have a laborious, learned, thoughtful, and complete review of the poetical work of English-speaking authors since 1835 ; a review as thorough as historical writing ought to be, and in such a chapter as that on Browning, anticipating, I am sure, the ultimate verdict of the poet-artist and critic of the future.

Already the poets of whom Mr. Stedman treats have more readers in America than in England ; in a generation the central powers and influences of English thought and literature will have transferred their abode to the great nation of the western world. This change has not yet come, though it impends; and it is well that American criticism soberly anticipates its arrival by a grave, broad, and self-respecting appeal to the canons of universal literature, and not by the didacticism, the small personalities, or the frantic nationalism which once were thought necessary or excusable.

HISTORIANS.

TOWARD the close of the eighteenth century, and indeed when the nineteenth century was well advanced, there was little to indicate the commanding place to be held by American historical writing in the literature of the world. The Saxon mind is an observant one; and certainly the early English settlers in America had written sufficiently numerous and voluminous chronicles of their sight-seeings and experiences. But the admirable diaries of William Bradford, John Winthrop, and Samuel Sewall did not foretell, with any certainty, the coming of a historical literature. To be a good writer of diaries is one thing; to be a broad and able historian quite another. Pepys was not a great social analyst, nor Boswell a critical biographer. Prince's "Annals" and Stith's "History of Virginia," of all the books recorded in the chapter on "Early Descriptive and Historical Writers," were the only ones we can call precursors of Bancroft's works, or Motley's; and he would certainly be a very patriotic student who would pretend to find in them traces of the powers of a great historian. All praise, of its kind, belongs to those who patiently treasured perishable information, or who set in order their little stock of colonial records; but their time was not ripe for the appearance of historians in the truer sense.

Nearly every one of the earliest American historical writers was a man of affairs, a participator in the deeds he described. This was specially true of Smith, Bradford, Winthrop, the Mathers, Sewall, and Stith; and the remark applies equally well to Thomas Hutchinson, whose name may stand at the chronological head of this later list. When we look at the commanding figures of the Revolutionary leaders in Massachusetts, we are inclined to forget that Hutchinson, for a considerable ^{Thomas Hutchinson,} period, was really the "leading spirit of ^{1711-1780.} the Province."* It meant much, in colonial days, for a man to be member of the general court, speaker of the same, chief-justice, member of the provincial council, lieutenant-governor, and governor. Hutchinson, though a Tory, and a legal representative of the authority of the crown, was a native of Boston, a graduate of Harvard, and a genuine New-Englander. Modern readers sometimes forget that a fair share of the intelligence and conscience of the colonies, as well as of their wealth, was on the Tory side. Though Hutchinson became exceedingly, and naturally, unpopular during the patriotic American uprising in the decade before the Revolution; though his house was more than once attacked, its contents burned, and its historical collections dispersed; and though, finally, Hutchinson was driven from the place of his birth, even before the guns of Lexington and Concord were fired, there is no reason why, in these dispassionate days, he should not be credited with an honest desire to do what he deemed right. Loyalty to conviction certainly cost him more than a similar fidelity to conscience cost the "traitor" Adams, or Hancock, or Otis.

Hutchinson sat in a chair occupied by Winthrop and William Shirley before him, and by John Hancock, Samuel Adams, James Sullivan, Elbridge Gerry, Edward Everett, Emory Washburn, and John A. Andrew after him. His intellectual ability was such as to make him worthy of mention in this honorable company. His "History of the Province of Massachusetts Bay," which, in its completed form, brings the story down to the very year of the author's exit from the colony, may fairly be called a praiseworthy production, even from the literary standpoint. One old book may be valuable as an original authority, another may be prized for its quaintness of autobiographical detail or social chronicle. Hutchinson's work offers something more than this, and deserves some credit for its literary style. Notwithstanding the marked political opinions of the author, one feels a confidence in his statements greater than that reposed in the writings of the professional moralist Cotton Mather. Naturally, Hutchinson never attained a title of the popularity enjoyed by Increase and Cotton Mather in their capacity of historians; politics had crowded literature to the wall, and Hutchinson was not the man to get an impartial hearing in his lifetime. But it is now apparent that he possessed an ability shared but never fully displayed by Thomas Prince : that of accumulating, studying, and assimilating historical materials, and placing them before the reader in an orderly and intelligible form. It is this ability that makes the historian ; and in the maturity and thoroughness of Hutchinson's work we find the beginning of the second and principal period of historical literature in America. More than this one cannot claim ; to say less than this would be injustice. In Hutchinson's diary and miscellaneous papers are sometimes to be found a loftiness of thought and a transparency of diction which are similar to the good literary qualities of the "History." Hutchinson was an aristocrat, hence he was a political failure in New England ; but his aristocracy helped him win his success as a writer, because it taught him, in a time of hurry and excitement, which followed an age of Matherian, pompous half-knowledge, to be patient, serious, and just in his historical investigations, and to try to be stately and finished in verbal expression. The charge of trickiness and double-dealing, made and believed in Hutchinson's lifetime, affects his character as a man rather than as a historian. Reduced to its lowest terms, and patiently investigated, it means that Hutchinson, always a consistent Tory, wrote some things in his English letters which, very naturally, he left unsaid at home. Noble and beneficent as were the results of the Revolution to America and the world, we are compelled to admit that, on both sides, the adaptation of means to ends was sometimes not in strict accord with the highest equity. Admitting against Hutchinson more than can be proved, his "History" remains both creditable and trustworthy, an honorable leader of an honored line.

Naturally the earlier American historians selected local themes. Documents concerning foreign topics were lacking in America; libraries were few and scantily supplied; European travel or residence involved an expense impossible for writers not diplomats as well; and the novelty and attractiveness of subjects close at hand led the first historians to address themselves to their home public. They were, for the most part, employed in other than literary tasks, and gave to writing such time as could be spared from exacting daily work. Jeremy Belknap, like so many of the American writers who were laying the foundations for a future literature, was a minister. To go to college, teach school, to study divinity, to preach, and incidentally to turn out pamphlet sermons, "poetry," or more ambitious work, was almost the rule among our early writers. Belknap's career may be summarized thus: his pastorates at Dover and Boston (where he preceded Dr. Channing in the Federal Street Church) were honorable; and though his higher literary tastes were for historical study, he would hardly have been a New England minister had he not written a theological treatise or some similar production. Thus he prepared a long-titled reply to Thomas Paine and his "Age of Reason"; wrote a life of Isaac Watts; and edited a collection of psalms and hymns, some of which were original. Verse was an occasional recreation of Belknap's; and in a story called "The Foresters" he attempted, with some success, to give a semi-humorous summary of American history, by means of a cumbersome personification, one State being John Codline, another Robert Lumber, etc. Speaking of this book and the author's other work, William Cullen Bryant* too amiably declared that Belknap was "the first to make American history attractive." "His Historical Account of those Persons who have been Distinguished in America as Adventurers, Statesmen, Philosophers, Divines, Warriors, Authors, and other Remarkable Characters, Comprehending a Recital of the Events Connected with their Lives and Actions"—there were titles in those days—was a useful successor of Mather's "Magnalia," and a precursor of Sparks' "American Biography." The appearance of the word "authors" at the end of Dr. Belknap's list is of interest.

But the course of our narrative of literary progress must not be turned aside by matters of no more than quaint or antiquarian concern. It is enough to say that Belknap, more than any other man, aided in the establishment of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and wrote a serviceable "History of New Hampshire." That this history, in accordance with the prevalent fashion, was also a gazetteer, and that it does not possess literary merit, are facts which need not blind us to its significance in the provincial period of American historical writing, so soon to give place to a time of broader and more enduring work. The chief names among those who were advancing historical investigation in the United States, at the beginning of the present century, seem to me to be those of Belknap, Abiel Holmes, and Hannah Adams in New England, and Dr. David Ramsay in South Carolina. Holmes' "American Annals, or Chronological History of America from its Discovery in MCCCCXCII to MDCCCVI," packs a large amount of well digested and conveniently arranged information within two trim volumes. "Annals," perhaps the driest form of composition, Dr. Holmes actually made interesting. Hannah Adams, who wrote as many religious books as if she were an orthodox Congregational minister of the day, prepared a "History of New England," which, in its way, though not an original authority, was as useful as Dr. Holmes' more ambitious work; its place in the development of woman's intellectual opportunities is obvious. Ramsay's historical labors were more extended than those of the New England writers just mentioned. Born in Pennsylvania, his life was spent in South Carolina; he was twice a Congressman; and his long literary career marked the modest development of general literature in the South. By tastes and habits he closely resembled the professional authors of older and richer communities, or of later days in America. He was a voluminous writer on medical subjects; he treated of South Carolina history somewhat as Belknap had treated of that of the most northern of the old colonies; and his "History of the Revolution in South Carolina," and "History of the American Revolution," were based upon original documents and extended personal acquaintance with leading patriots. Similarly, the "Life of Washington" embodied the recollections of one who had been a friend of the great Virginia general and statesman. Ramsay's final achievement, posthumously published, was the twelve-volume work bearing the imposing title of "Universal History Americanized; or An Historical View of the World from the Earliest Records to the Nineteenth Century; with a Particular Reference to the State of Society, Literature, Religion, and Form of Government of the United States of America." History, and even language, had to be "Americanized" in those days; Noah Webster prepared an "American Dictionary of the English Language." But the triumphant patriots, at any rate, were reading; and their authors, industrious though few, were supplying them with books which, though not important as literature, were spreading popular information. If one were writing a history of intellectual progress in New England and South Carolina, perhaps the temptation to laud unduly the labors of Belknap, Holmes, Miss Adams, and Ramsay might be too strong for resistance. But as it is, the sager reader recognizes in their industry and success, under disadvantageous circumstances, a prophecy rather than an achievement. Their books are now somewhat serviceable as side-lights on contemporary themes, and are honored as indications of the irresistible desire to study and write. Less interesting and valuable than the records of Bradford, Winthrop, and Stith on the one hand, or the later histories on the other, they instructed the general reader, and stimulated the better-equipped writer to endeavor to surpass the achievements of those who, at least, had done what lay within their power. Of the four writers, Dr. Holmes, on the whole, produced the greatest work, and Miss Adams the least.

With Jared Sparks, though not in him, appeared the latest and highest development of historical study and writing in America. Not an investigator of the highest order, not a writer who could set forth historical statements with the best rhetorical skill, and not the author of any single work to be compared with the masterpieces of his greater contemporaries, Sparks shared and promoted, in good measure, the later studies from which so valuable results were attained. Born on a Connecticut farm in 1789, as a lad he was farmer, miller, carpenter, and at last rustic pedagogue. Working his way through school and college, by dint of hard work, and aided by kind friends, he soon was rewarded, notwithstanding the disadvantages of his early life, by that prompt appreciation which, for some reason, was often bestowed upon young Harvard men at the beginning of the century. At twenty-eight he was a tutor in the college; soon after he was an assistant in conducting The North American Review; at thirty he was a Unitarian minister in Baltimore; and at thirty-two, chaplain of the national House of Representatives. He shared, of course, in the production of the controversial books which were so multiplied in the days of the Unitarian discussions; and he edited a denominational periodical. Not often in the intellectual history of the world, has so much theological writing been done by men afterwards famous in other departments of literary labor. Within a few years, Sparks returned to Boston, bought The North American Review, and began in 1828 the career in which he was to win his greatest success. His "Life of John Ledyard, the American Traveller," was published in that year,—a biography so interesting in theme as to attain a large sale, and so faithful in method and so commendable in style as to promise, notwithstanding the unimportant character of its subject, Sparks' future success. His first greater work, the "Life and Writings of George Washington," was already under way. In prosecuting this task, Sparks adopted methods hitherto unfamiliar, for the most part, in America. He searched faithfully the records in the possession of the States and the national government; he obtained access to many valuable papers still in the custody of the Washington family; and visiting Europe, in the course of his studies, he was enabled to copy valuable, and so far as American readers were concerned, unknown, documents in the possession of the English and French governments. The work, when completed in 1837, consisted of twelve octavo volumes, well edited, well arranged, and well printed, covering by far the most important part of Washington's public and private papers, though, of course, not professing to be absolutely complete. The first of these twelve volumes consisted of a new life of Washington, based upon the editor's original researches. Readers at home felt that the small and poor literature of the young country was honored by the appearance of such a work; and foreign students, who were much more interested in American politics than in American poetry or piety, gave it a cordial welcome. Of less value and interest, but still important, was Sparks' collection of the "Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution," based on the records at Washington, and supplemented by materials gathered by the editor in the course of his European and other studies for the Washington work.

Thus far Sparks had collected what was, for all practical purposes, the whole body of Washington's writing; and had faithfully reprinted, in a form for permanent reference, many of the most important papers of the Revolutionary period, representing the labors of such men as Franklin, Jay, and Adams. It was clearly indicated that Sparks' service to American literature was chiefly to be that of a faithful editor and collector, particularly in the field of political biography. A "Life of Gouverneur Morris" (Minister to France, United States Senator, and prominent Federalist politician in New York) filled another gap on the biographical shelf. Then followed Sparks' "Library of American Biography," a series which in fulness, accuracy, and literary style surpassed any previous attempt of the sort in America. Twenty-five volumes of this precursor of the "American Statesmen" series or the "American Men of Letters" series, were issued under Sparks' editorship between 1834 and 1848. More than one life was printed in each volume, and many writers were represented in the list of biographers. Sparks himself wrote eight of the sketches, and was aided by his friends in the Boston literary "set," or from other circles of competent men. The series, as a whole, performed a good work; it set before American readers clear and sufficiently full records of the leading men of the New World,—records elsewhere hardly accessible. Its principal defect was one due to the time in which it was published: a lack of the critical spirit. "How wonderful!" was the expression likely to spring from the lips of Americans, as they read of the doings of their predecessors; and Sparks and his associates too often wrote in a spirit of undue adulation.

In 1840 Sparks published "The Works of Benjamin Franklin; containing several Political and Historical Tracts not included in any former edition, and many Letters, Official and Private, not hitherto published; with notes and a Life of the Author." This edition of Franklin, in ten volumes, remained for nearly half a century the ablest in existence, though, of course, its reprint of the Autobiography was much less perfect than that afterward edited by John Bigelow. The chief services of Sparks consisted, on the whole, of his preparation of the opera omnia of Washington and Franklin. The former was supplemented, in 1854, by "The Correspondence of the American Revolution," letters to Washington from 1775 to 1797, edited from holographs in Sparks' collection. Jared Sparks was not a historian in the higher sense, though it is customary to rank him with the better American writers. He was not an analyst like Bancroft; he lacked the rhetorical and descriptive power of Prescott; nor, of course, could he be analyst and painter in one, like Motley. He was by nature a collector and arranger of materials, rather than one who, like Gibbon, could draw from them a connected story. His lives of Washington and Franklin are but extended prefaces to his collections of their writings. He left no original work of the highest class, to which the student can point as Sparks' own achievement. Again, he lacked the power of sharply separating the good and the bad in a man's character, and of describing both in an impartial and instructive manner. He was unduly fond of eulogizing his subjects: the besetting sin of American writers "before the war," a sin not yet fully atoned and corrected. But without his useful labors later writers would have lacked a needed helper. Valuable material might have perished; and historical study, both in the author's library and at the reader's table, would have lost a great stimulus. Patience and industry, with an unfaltering determination to discover and preserve all original documents of importance, were qualities which marked Sparks' mind and directed his life-work. These qualities, ever necessary to the historical student, had not been too common in America at the beginning of his career. He went to first sources, and taught others so to do.

It is fitting that the name of George Bancroft should stand at the head of the later and higher historians in his country. He resembled his predecessors who worked toward historical results in public life, as well as chronicled them with the pen. Bancroft did not share, of course, in the events which he described ; but his long career was identified with the public interests of the United States. Secretary of the Navy, Minister to England, and afterward Minister to Germany, he was familiar with the affairs of the government at home, and with diplomatic duties abroad. By his patience, his firmness of touch, his habits of industrial research among original documents, his unwillingness to leave events unexplained or springs of character misunderstood, and his forcible English style, Bancroft was well fitted for the task which became his life-work : the writing of a "History of the United States."

George Bancroft was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, in the last year of the eighteenth century. He was a promising lad at Phillips Exeter Academy, New Hampshire, and was a graduate of Harvard College at sixteen ; the requisitions for graduation at that day being about equivalent to those for entrance at the present time. In 1817 the fashion for European travel and study was beginning to affect the United States, in particular Massachusetts, New York, and Virginia; and young Bancroft was one of the first to connect himself with a German university. Göttingen was then the favorite academic town among Americans, and there Bancroft studied, as well as at Berlin. The "grand tour" followed; celebrated professors and men of letters became familiar to him; and he shared in the enthusiastic study of German literature, which then began to influence our national thought. It is a matter of important record, which should not be forgotten by the student of American books, that the force of the newly revived Teutonic mind was directly felt in America simultaneously with its impact upon British thought. Germany and its philosophy and literature were not less known and not less highly esteemed in the United States than in England and Scotland, between 1815 and 1840. In Bancroft's mind this philosophy and literature had an effect less directly apparent than in the minds of some of his friends or contemporaries; but his breadth and strength of culture received material help from his university life abroad. Provincialism was already beginning to wane, in America; and it was of particular importance that the leading national historian should be emancipated from its influence, before he began his principal task.

In the year 1823 there was published at Cambridge, "from the University Press, Hilliard and Metcalf," a slim volume of "Poems" by George Bancroft. In looking at this beginning of Bancroft's book-list, so unlike its successors from the same pen, one is reminded of the belles-lettres experiments of other American writers before they found their true place : of Everett's tracts and Greek grammar ; John Quincy Adams' rhetoric ; Judge Story's poems ; Motley's novels, " Merry Mount " and " Morton's Hope " ; or the ventures in fiction of Hildreth and Parkman, etc. To discuss at length this respectable volume of verse would be to turn aside to a matter of mere bibliography, or to make an entertaining excursion to view one of the " curiosities of American literature." The real significance of the booklet is that it strikingly shows the incipient influence of European travel, and of the thought suggested by that travel, upon American poetry. The general method and the prevalent feeling are not unlike those of Coleridge and Southey in their descriptive pieces, though the execution is of course far below that of the first-named. All but one of the poems are European in theme ; six are grouped under the title " In Switzerland, September and October, 1821 " ; eleven are " In Italy, 1822 " ; and the last and longest, in heroic measure, is " Pictures of Rome." The young poet's aspirations, at least, are Coleridgean :

Father in heaven ! while friendless and alone
 I gaze on nature's face in Alpine wild,
 I would approach thee nearer. Wilt thou own
 The solitary pilgrim for thy child.

When on the hill's majestic height I trod,
 And thy creation smiling round me lay,
 The soul reclaimed its likeness unto God,
 And spurned its union with the baser clay.

His pictures are of Chamouni, the Valley above Inden, the Wengern-Alp, the Simplon, the Fountain of Trevi, Rome ; and in presence of such scenes he writes verse a little more free in thought and form than that of the school of Pope, but less bold than that of the English poets of the time. A lesser Cowper seems to have set out upon a continental tour, pen in hand ; and there is at least a marked difference between these poems by Bancroft and the Connecticut-nature poems of President Dwight, such as "Greenfield Hill," 1794 ; or the artificial "Power of Solitude," and the "Fugitive Poems," of Judge Story, printed ten years after Dwight's ambitious production. Versification, when it is a little less than poetry, may be called the note-book of the author's mind and mood ; Bancroft's note-book showed that he was beginning to adapt himself to wider scenes and more catholic methods than most of his countrymen knew.

We need not stop to chronicle or to discuss the translations of German poems and the miscellaneous prose articles which Bancroft wrote before he was thirty years of age. They indicate that he felt and shared the spirit which was beginning to inform so many of his contemporaries ; and that, like the early critics mentioned in the preceding chapter, he was willing to instruct as well as to discuss. Almost every young man of letters turns over in his mind many vague plans and possible schemes for authorship, before he begins his life-work, which may be widely different from that at first imagined. Bancroft, in early youth, had given few indications of the fact that history was to be his chief field of labor ; but in 1834 appeared the first volume, prepared with painstaking effort, of his "History of the United States." Exactly half a century was to elapse before the author issued, in 1884, the sixth and final volume of the last-revised edition of this his masterpiece, bringing United States history down to 1789, the beginning of the constitutional period. These fifty years were spent in deliberate, untiring investigation, in the most methodical writing, and occasionally in controversy connected with statements made in the work ; but the "History," in its maturest form, shows few alterations, as compared with its first presentation. The plan had evidently been carefully prepared, and the method of elaboration duly arranged. Bancroft avoids the brilliant rhetorical effects of Macaulay, never allowing himself, in particular, to indulge in excessive antithesis, with its attendant dangers of undue blame and praise. He gravely adds sentence to sentence, without the word-painting one finds so attractive in Motley, Prescott, or Parkman, but certainly without dulness. The style is severe and condensed, but clear ; it can hardly be called picturesque, but its effect is to leave definite and lasting ideas in the reader's mind. It resembles the best European masterpieces in gravity, thoroughness, and minutely conscientious workmanship ; and yet it is a history which could hardly have been written by another than an American, even aside from the fact that so many of the authorities were to be found in American treasuries. Bancroft, in deep and perpetual devotion to ecclesiastical and civil liberty, is a typical product of the New World, and a lineal successor of the early colonists and the immediate founders of the republic. He discerns and clearly points out the fact that the English colonists on the shores of America, in the seventeenth century, possessed a freedom unusual to those in similar circumstances. These colonists were Englishmen, of the same blood with those who secured the Magna Charta, who have been governed by parliament more truly than by king, and who, even in the old country, have never lost democratic proclivities. In America such Englishmen were freed from many of the constraints existing in the mother-country: they elected their governors and legislatures; they shaped their own ecclesiastical and civil relations; and only when they felt upon them the hand of power which, because unseen, they had half thought to be non-existent, did they rebel and form a new nation. To tell this story was Bancroft's task; and it will hardly need to be retold in full by other writers.

His opportunities for gathering and studying original documents, both in the United States and in Europe, were very great; and of them he made good use. No American writer, I suppose, has been more diligent in this matter, though others have been obliged to search out more obscure and unfamiliar papers. But Bancroft's idea of the proper use of "original documents" has not been that of some modern historians. He does not spread before his readers an undigested mass of letters, reports, or contemporary statements, of all grades of truth or falsehood, value or worthlessness. Documents themselves make but a small showing in his pages. From them he sifts the facts, and offers the facts to the reader in a concise form. Foot-notes, even, are sparingly used. Authorities are kept in reserve for subsequent justification or for controversial purposes if need be. Bancroft trusts his own judgment rather than that of the reader, as far as decisions are concerned; well knowing that his familiarity with the whole theme, and with particular divisions, is the greater.

Again, acting on this method, he gives us a complete account of a long period, as viewed by one mind after profound study. Equal to the "specialists" in learning, he has the broad view of a Gibbon or a Motley.

Bancroft's "History of the United States" was well under way before the full development of the modern philosophical method of writing history. Stubbs and Taine were his successors, not his teachers. But the philosophical idea is prevalent, and apparent, throughout. The work aims to tell us what the colonies were at the start, how they were developed, and why they took the course adopted in 1775 and 1776. Buckle would have laid more emphasis, had he been writing such a history, upon external influences and the environment. Carlyle would have written more constantly of the force exerted by the colonists, and of their power in shaping their surroundings, defeating their adversaries from beyond seas, and working their will. But it cannot be claimed that Bancroft has ignored or minimized the force-element in the inherited Saxon character, nor, on the other hand, that he has forgotten the potent shaping effect of long residence in a fertile country, remote from the old home, under conditions favoring governmental and individual freedom.

Many historians, including some not of the highest rank, have easily surpassed Bancroft in power of picturesque description of events. Even his account of the battle of Bunker Hill, though it is terse, clear, and orderly, is less graphic and telling than the reader might expect. Prescott, Motley, or Parkman would have wrought up the subject with more rhetorical skill. Indeed, Bancroft's matter is, as a rule, more praiseworthy than his literary manner. His most conspicuous successes are to be found in his analyses of the character of individuals or of bodies of men. Read a part of his estimate of Washington's character :

His faculties were so well balanced and combined that his constitution, free from excess, was tempered evenly with all the elements of activity, and his mind resembled a well-ordered commonwealth; his passions, which had the intensest vigor, owned allegiance to reason; and, with all the fiery quickness of his spirit, his impetuous and massive will was held in check by consummate judgment. He had in his composition a calm, which gave him in moments of highest excitement the power of self-control, and enabled him to excel in patience, even when he had most cause for disgust. Washington was offered a command when there was little to bring out the unorganized resources of the continent but his own influence, and authority was connected with the people by the most frail, most attenuated, scarcely discernible threads; yet, vehement as was his nature, impassioned as was his courage, he so restrained his ardor that he never failed continuously to exert that influence, and never exerted it so sharply as to break its force. . . . His understanding was lucid and his judgment accurate, so that his conduct never betrayed hurry or confusion. No detail was too minute for his personal inquiry and continued supervision; and at the same time he comprehended events in their widest aspects and relations. He never seemed above the object that engaged his attention, and was always equal, without an effort, to the solution of the highest questions affecting the destiny of mankind, even when there existed no precedents to guide his decision. In the perfection of the reflective powers he had no peer. In this way he never drew to himself admiration for the possession of any one quality in excess, never made in council any one suggestion that was sublime but impracticable, never in action took to himself the praise or the blame of undertakings astonishing in conception, but beyond his means of execution. It was the most wonderful accomplishment of this man that, placed upon the largest theatre of events, at the head of the greatest revolution in human affairs, he never failed to observe all that was possible, and at the same time to bound his endeavors by that which was possible . . . Profoundly impressed with confidence in God's providence, and exemplary in his respect for the forms of public worship, no philosopher of the eighteenth century was more firm in the support of freedom of religious opinion, none more remote from religious bigotry; but belief in God and trust in his overruling power formed the essence of his character. Divine wisdom not only illumines the spirit, it inspires the will. Washington was a man of action; his creed appears in his life; professions burst from him very rarely, and only at those great moments of crisis in the fortunes of his country when earth and heaven seemed actually to meet, and his emotions became too intense for suppression; but his whole being was one continued act of faith in the eternal, intelligent, moral order of the universe. Integrity was so completely the law of his nature that a planet would sooner have shot from its sphere than he have departed from his uprightness, which was so constant that it often seemed to be almost impersonal. "His integrity was the most pure, his justice the most inflexible I have ever known," writes Jefferson, "no motives of interest or consanguinity, of friendship or hatred, being able to bias his decision." . . . They say of Giotto that he introduced goodness into the art of painting; Washington carried it with him to the camp and the cabinet, and established a new criterion of human greatness.*

This certainly is very high praise. As we think of some others of the world's great men, we ask: Could such an estimate be made of the character of Julius Cæsar, Charlemagne, Alfred the Great, William of Orange, Wellington, Napoleon? After reading it are we not inclined, in our haste, to ostracize this American Aristides, and to turn with some pleasure to less favorable estimates, in such works as the "History of the People of the United States," by Professor John Bach McMaster, which shall show us a more human and fallible Washington? McMaster, who takes up the national story where Bancroft leaves it—and the value of whose work, still incomplete, cannot now be estimated here—hardly agrees with Bancroft's comparison between Washington and a planet in its course, or with Jefferson's reverential laudation. McMaster would have us see the Washington of real life, and would have us believe him a hero whom one would rather praise dead than know living. In the following clear sentences we hardly seem to see the man of whom Bancroft spoke :

He died in his sixty-eighth year, and in the heyday of his glory and his fame. Time has since dealt gently with his memory, and he has come down to us as the greatest of all leaders and the most immaculate of all men. No other face is so familiar to us.

McMaster's
Washington.

His name is written all over the map of our country. We have made of his birthday a national feast. The outlines of his biography are known to every school-boy in the land. Yet his true biography is still to be prepared. General Washington is known to us, and President Washington. But George Washington is an unknown man. When at last he is set before us in his habit as he lived, we shall read less of the cherry-tree and more of the man. Naught surely that is heroic will be omitted, but side by side with what is heroic will appear much that is commonplace. We shall behold the great commander repairing defeat with marvellous celerity, healing the dissensions of his officers, and calming the passions of his mutinous troops. But we shall also hear his oaths, and see him in those terrible outbursts of passion to which Mr. Jefferson has alluded, and one of which Mr. Lear has described. We shall see him refusing to be paid for his services by Congress, yet exacting from the family of the poor mason the shilling that was his due. We shall know him as the cold and forbidding character with whom no fellow-man ever ventured to live on close and familiar terms. We shall respect and honor him for being, not the greatest of generals, not the wisest of statesmen, not the most saintly of his race, but a man with many human frailties and much common-sense, who rose in the fulness of time to be the political deliverer of our country.

The latest historians are apt to be severer than their predecessors. It is well, perhaps, to be reminded thus that the American people have apotheosized Washington and have beatified Lincoln. The "devil's advocate" is needed to examine the acta sanctorum, lest history be falsified; and we owe thanks to those who assume the ungracious task. But hero-worship is a better national element than indifferentism. When good and bad are balanced in our estimate of Washington, the good far predominates. In history his name will always stand with those of Alfred and Orange; it may challenge comparison with Charlemagne's, and in some obvious merits it surpasses those of Cæsar, Wellington, and Napoleon. Washington was a great man, but above all things the man for his time. It was far better that he should lead the Revolutionary war than for any other soldier to do so. It is not pleasant to think of the results which would have followed had Hamilton been the first Federalist President of the republic. All this Mr. Bancroft has made plain, so long as his masterly history shall be read.

His account and analysis of the character of the Puritans is neither less strong nor less favorable than this estimate of Washington. Bancroft, like so many authors of New England birth, had grown away from the theological position and the social rigor of the Puritans, but was a legitimate successor of theirs, in the matter of insistence upon individual freedom in religion and politics. The progress of history within the past three hundred years has certainly shown, as he would have us believe, that Puritanism was more beneficial to America than that spirit of chivalry which he contrasts with it. Had Puritanism petrified, and never been developed into something broader and serener, it would have crushed out the life of American poetry and art, almost of American humanity ; but as a foundation, a starting-point, nothing better could have been found.

Richard Hildreth's " History of the United States " naturally claims mention here. Formerly it was deemed a rival, or at least a fellow, of Bancroft's ; but Hildreth's work has proved less valuable as the years have passed by, and now is regarded as of a lower order of merit. Hildreth's sympathies were less democratic than Bancroft's, and his eulogies of the Federalists, in the nation-making days, are correspondingly fervid. Hildreth began to print his history in 1849, and finished it in 1853, bringing the record down to 1821. Bancroft's, begun fifteen years before, and finished a generation after Hildreth's, comes down to a date no later than 1789. The chief value of Hildreth's work has depended upon the fact that, for many years prior to the beginning of the histories by Schouler and McMaster (still in progress, and describing the United States under the Constitution), there was no other elaborate account of the period including the administrations of Presidents Washington, John Adams, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe,—the formative period of the nation. Hildreth's estimates of character are of service, but are usually severe. His denunciations of men great, if faulty (in particular of Jefferson), make more notable his inclusion of Hamilton among "the serene and benign sons of the celestial gods." We can endure this sort of writing in Washington's case, but in Hamilton's it becomes insufferable. Hildreth's attitude toward Puritanism and the New England element is substantially that of Bancroft; but toward the South there is greater hostility, for Hildreth was by intense convictions a Federalist, Whig, Abolitionist.

Hildreth's "History of the United States" cannot be called a hasty or superficial production. His material was ample, he had studied it and arranged it with care, and though, at the last, he wrote rapidly, he had been preparing to write all his life, and merely transcribed the records stored in a full mind. If he was politician as well as historian, the same might be said of his rival Bancroft, whose democracy was as intense, though not as aggressive, as Hildreth's whiggism. Hildreth's miscellaneous writing was of slight or temporary value: "Archy Moore," an anti-slavery novel; a campaign life of Harrison, written for the "log-cabin and hard-cider" campaign of 1840; "A Theory of Morals and a Theory of Politics"; books or newspaper articles in favor of free banking or against the annexation of Texas. All this printed matter, though now unvalued and unread, was in a small sense a work of preparation for the larger labor of the author's lifetime. The history is clear, though it cannot be called readable; the art of picturesque writing was not known to Hildreth; and even his characterizations, contrasts, and denunciations do not quicken the reader's pulse. His statements of facts are trustworthy; they cover a period still undescribed in any other work of the same size; and they are marked by the courage of conviction and an intrepid desire to state the truth. It would be idle to claim that his pages are untinged by political prejudice; but certainly the author did not consciously yield to that prejudice.

Hildreth's history has long been deemed an authority; but I do not see how it can fail to fall into increasing neglect year by year. In its treatment of the early constitutional period of the United States, for which it used to be esteemed, it is in almost every way inferior to T. W. Higginson's "Larger History of the United States, to the Close of Jackson's Presidency." Higginson equals Hildreth in originality and industry, and surpasses him in vigor, picturesqueness, and readableness. Higginson's long career as an essayist and newspaper writer had given him finished literary style, in which he has well set forth the results of his later historical studies. One speaks with diffidence concerning so recent a work; but of all Higginson's long list of books this history seems most likely to endure.

Wentworth
Higginson,

All the historians whose names have thus far been considered in this chapter wrote of the development of the country of their birth, and chiefly, of course, of the development of its eastern part. Hutchinson traced the history of Massachusetts, Belknap of New Hampshire, Ramsay of South Carolina and of the Revolution, Miss Adams of New England,

Holmes of America as a whole. In the succeeding generation, Sparks wrote that part of the American history which is included in the biography of noteworthy men. Hannah Adams, to compare lesser writers with greater, may be called the forerunner of John Gorham Palfrey, and in a broader field Holmes was the precursor, and one not unworthy, of Hildreth and Bancroft. These are the names of the more noted American historians whose field has lain within the borders of the United States. After describing the work of Palfrey, we shall turn to other writers who have found themes in the new states of the Pacific coast; in French and English America outside the United States; or in Mexico, South America, and the continent of Europe.

Nearly all the leading American historians grew up in the days of the Unitarian revival in New England, and several of them shared in the attendant controversies. Belknap and Holmes had been Congregational ministers before the division of the Congregational churches of Massachusetts into Trinitarian and Unitarian; Bancroft, Hildreth, and Parkman were the sons of Congregational ministers, who joined the Unitarian ranks; while Sparks and Palfrey were Unitarian ministers, actively engaged in the work of their profession, before they attained celebrity as historians. Hildreth, Sparks, and Palfrey, indeed, took a somewhat active part in the doctrinal discussions of the period of their youth and early manhood; John Gorham Palfrey, 1796-1881. and the last-named, besides his experience as pastor in Boston, served as professor of biblical literature in the divinity school at Harvard.

A German, French, or English secular historian, who had published a volume of sermons on the duties of private life, two octavo volumes on the evidences of Christianity, four volumes of lectures on the Jewish scriptures, and another on quotations from the Old Testament, would be deemed almost a curiosity ; yet such was Palfrey's preliminary work. In quantity it was perhaps not noticeable, even in New England ; but the union between theological pursuits and literary, in that section of America, was no new thing, nor had it ceased in the first part of the nineteenth century. We cannot, in all probability, look for its continuance ; we need consider now only its relation to the literary quality of the histories under consideration. It affected that quality indirectly, in that the clergy, from 1800 to 1840, were still the best-educated class, and the one from which writers were most likely to come. We do not forget that the fathers of Emerson, Lowell, and Holmes were ministers. The principal direct influence of New England Unitarianism upon Bancroft, Hildreth, Sparks, or Palfrey is to be looked for in their devotion to the element of intellectual freedom in the colonies, from 1620 onward. The theological dogmas of the Puritans they handle with more or less criticism or hostility ; but for the theory of the Puritans, in so far as it formed or modified the subsequent spiritual, mental, or political work of the colonies and nation, they show respect, and sometimes hearty admiration. They wrote American history with sympathy, from within ; yet their altered theological beliefs transported them, as it were, to an outside point of view, and helped to make them impartial on-lookers. Some of them, and the remark Palfrey's is certainly true as applied to Palfrey, saw "History of New England." with keen eyes, and exposed pitilessly to the light of later days, the cold, hard, and baneful side of Puritanism : its repression of sentiment and of humanity, its denial to others of the freedom it arrogated to itself, and its share in the bloody persecutions that disgraced so many Christian churches, Protestant far less than Catholic, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Yet Palfrey, even in his account of witchcraft, if as severe as truth is also as broad as the spirit of history. "The people of Massachusetts," he writes, "in the seventeenth century, like all other Christian people at that time and later,—at least, with extremely rare exceptions,—believed in the reality of a hideous crime called witchcraft. They thought they had Scripture for that belief, and they knew they had law for it, explicit and abundant ; and with them law and Scripture were absolute authorities for the regulation of opinion and conduct." I do not see how more could be put into two sentences on this awful subject. Here is a statement of the general opinion of the world, shared by so lovely a soul and so thorough a broad-churchman as Sir Thomas Browne ; and here, too, is a clear presentation of the theocratic polity of the Puritans, as applied to church and state. Thus Dr. Palfrey goes on with his sad story, and in this spirit he writes his whole history.

cott or Motley. But Hildreth is painfully dry ; his history is virtually annals rather than history, and certainly it is no more readable than the modest annals of Dr. Abiel Holmes. Palfrey, plain, matter-of-fact, and straightforward, interests us from the start. The "History of New England," as he prepared it, could be made the basis of a compendious work for popular reading, and also could win the applause of Mr. Lowell and other critics of high standing. Palfrey, indeed, though read by a general public, seems to me an authors' author in some such sense, mutatis mutandis, as Landor was a poets' poet. He wrote of a subject familiar to at least twenty scholars of high standing, living in his own community, and within reach of the authorities upon which he relied ; yet the trustworthiness of his work was not impeached in important particulars. Scholarly, accurate, and terse, he made his history, in itself, almost an original authority. His field was narrower than Bancroft's, but broader and more diversified than those covered by single works of Prescott or Motley ; this fact, perhaps, accounts for the comparative obscurity of his name, as set beside those of other American historians of the first rank. One thinks of Palfrey, after all, as he would think of a nineteenth-century Thomas Prince or William Stith. But that he is an historian of an honorable rank in his country's literature, can hardly be doubted. In ability of several kinds he surpasses Hildreth, and it does not seem rash to suppose that the passage of years will emphasize the fact. Like Hildreth, he left behind plenty of obscure books, of no lasting value ; but the greater achievement, though it cannot redeem the lesser from their fate, will at least be prominent in itself. The public of critics, furthermore, it should be said, is inclined to resent any condensation of a history, when performed by the author's own hand, and, on this account, possibly, some of them would associate Palfrey with the useful makers of school-book histories; but his purpose in preparing his compendiums was an honorable and justifiable one. Said Dr. Palfrey, in the preface to the third of his four volumes: "Mere literary reputation, if it were accessible to me, would not now be highly attractive. My ambition has rather been to contribute something to the welfare of my country, by reviving the image of the ancient virtue of New England, and I am likely to persist in the hope, that in that honest undertaking I shall not appear to have altogether failed." The question whether he failed may, perhaps, be answered in the words of the first American critic, James Russell Lowell:

"It is to the praise of his work that its merit lies more in its tone of thought and its weight of opinion than in picturesque effects. Brilliancy is cheap; but trustworthiness of thought and evenness of judgment are not to be had at every booth. Dr. Palfrey combines in the temper of his mind and the variety of his experience some quite peculiar qualifications for the task he has undertaken. A man of singular honesty of purpose and conscientiousness of action, a thoroughly trained theologian, he ripened and enlarged the somewhat partial knowledge of mankind and their motives which falls to the lot of a clergyman, by the experience of active politics and the training of practical statesmanship. . . . It is little to say that his work is the only one of its kind. He has done it so well that it is likely to remain so. With none of that glitter of style and epigrammatic point of expression, which please more than they enlighten, and tickle when they should instruct, there is a gravity and precision of thought, a sober dignity of expression, an equanimity of judgment, and a clear apprehension of characters and events, which give us the very truth of things as they are, and not as either he or his reader might wish them to be." *

I do not often give myself, or care to give myself, the pleasure of quoting the opinion of other critics concerning the merit or demerit of the works under discussion in these pages. But it would be a pleasure to cite Lowell more often than I find possible, not because of the external or merely literary merits of his style, nor because his judgments are so just, but because no American writer has so clearly apprehended and stated the American qualities of our literature. With a mind developed in the sources of the best European culture, Lowell perceives such truths as these :

"We do not mean that Dr. Palfrey, like a great many declaimers about the Pilgrim fathers, looks upon them all as men of grand conceptions and superhuman foresight. An entire ship's company of Columbuses is what the world never saw. Nor has he formed any theory, and fitted his facts to it, as a man in a hurry is apt to cram his travelling-bag, with a total disregard of shape or texture. But he has found that the facts will only fit comfortably together on a single plan, namely, that the fathers did have a conception (which those will call grand who regard simplicity as a necessary element of grandeur) of founding here a commonwealth on those two eternal bases of Faith and Work; that they had, indeed, no revolutionary ideas of universal liberty, but yet, what answered the purpose quite as well, an abiding faith in the brotherhood of men as children of God; and that they did not so much propose to make all things new as to develop the latent possibilities of English law and English character, by clearing away the fences by which the abuse of the one was gradually discommoning the other from the broad fields of natural right. They were not in advance of their age, as it is called, for no one who is so can ever work profitably in it; but they were alive to the highest and most earnest thinking of their time. Dr. Palfrey also makes it clear that the thought of separation from the parent state was not only not unfamiliar to the minds of the leaders of New England emigration, but that they looked forward to it and prepared for it as something that might be expedient or necessary according to the turn of events. Apart from contemporary evidence of their hopes and intentions, he finds in the inevitable results of the institutions they founded the proof of what they meant to do." *

I cannot but think that their high and ever-present conception of the American idea of the State has been a chief cause of the success of the two principal historians, Bancroft and Palfrey.—of the development of American institutions. The same notion of liberty is never lost to sight in the histories of Motley, having a foreign but kindred theme. It is also considered by Parkman, in some parts of his account of the struggle between France and England in North America. Prescott had less need to think of it, and yet he was an American writer, removed alike from the temptations incident to an aristocratic and unsympathetic society, and from those which, by a re-

This Americanism is not the silly and unscholarly national pride which used to swell in Fourth of July orations, and which is observable in some minor histories of American authorship. Our better writers, and some of the lesser, have been commendably impartial. Some more modest works—histories of States, sections, or even cities—might be chronicled here as creditable to the spirit and skill of their authors ; but, in such a record as this, the multiplication of names and titles confuses the reader's sense of perspective. I can hardly forbear, however, to mention the vast "History of the Pacific Coast of North America" (for so I may entitle the entire undertaking), which, in nearly forty large volumes, is gradually coming from the pen of Hubert Howe Bancroft and his fellow-workers. Seldom has a writer undertaken so vast a work ; Mr. Bancroft frankly admits that the scheme is too broad for his single hand, and that he employs the aid of those whose researches he but systematizes and puts into final form. His history stands midway between great collections of monographs by various writers (like Mr. Justin Winsor's "Narrative and Critical History of America"), and such unities as the works of Gibbon or George Bancroft. It may be questioned whether the view given by the single mind, within moderate compass, is not much superior to that displayed by the method of either a Winsor or a Hubert Bancroft. It has been wittily said that the scheme of the latter is based upon the idea that it is necessary to have, before history can be written, photographs of every object ever used by man. Certainly, in proportion to the average length of a reader's lifetime, a thirty-nine volume history of a comparatively unimportant part of the world is fitted for Brobdingnagians rather than for Americans.

But when one has said this, and has noted the fact that, in some of Mr. Bancroft's volumes there is a manifest lack of unity of style, praise is to be bestowed upon his undertaking. It is, of course, exhaustive; so vast a preliminary collection of manuscript or printed materials was never before accumulated by an American historical writer; the work of collection and condensation has been intelligently done—for there is condensation even in thirty-nine octavos; a spirit of historic impartiality is apparent; much that is interesting, as well to the anthropologist as to the historical student, has been preserved and conveniently arranged for reference; and surely it is not often that so large and useful a mass of material is reserved for that fortunate individual, "the historian of the future." I can fairly describe the merits and the limitations of Mr. Bancroft's great scheme, even before its completion, by saying that he is intelligently editing an encyclopædia of the history of that part of America to which he has devoted his life-work.

In taking up the books of Francis Parkman, we pass, for the most part, beyond the limits of the territory of the United States, though not beyond those of North America. Parkman's general theme is France and England in North America—one closely connected with the colonists' springs of action, as well as with the great European struggles of the eighteenth century, and of historical illumination for the minds of present readers.

The early training and the intellectual experience of Francis Parkman were in many respects similar to those of other American historians of corresponding rank. The son of a Unitarian minister, he was born in Boston, graduated at Harvard, and experimented in the art of fiction-writing. But his "Vassall Morton" has been assigned to the shelf whereon rest Motley's "Merry Mount" and Hildreth's "Archy Moore." More popular and more justly successful had been the volume entitled "The Oregon Trail: Sketches of Prairie and Rocky-Mountain Life." "The Oregon Trail." These sketches had been originally printed in the Knickerbocker Magazine, of New York, and were collected in a volume in 1847. The "Indian as he used to be" was vividly portrayed in these romantic sketches of real life, which formed a prelude to and preparation for some of the author's maturer studies. Just a quarter of a century after the appearance of this book, more graphic and picturesque than Irving's "Astoria," the author wrote of it, half in humor, half in sadness: "The wild cavalcade that defiled with me down the gorges of the Black Hills, with its paint and war-plumes, fluttering trophies and savage embroidery, bows, arrows, lances, and shields, will never be seen again. Those who formed it have found bloody graves, or a ghastlier burial in the maws of wolves. The Indian of to-day, armed with a revolver and crowned with an old hat, cased, possibly, in trousers, or muffled in a tawdry shirt, is an Indian still, but an Indian shorn of the picturesque which was his most conspicuous merit. The mountain trapper is no more, and the grim romance of his wild, hard life is a memory of the past." This memory of the past is that which is spread out for us upon Mr. Parkman's pages, which form a sort of supplement to Cooper's better novels. The passage just cited may fairly be taken as a sample of the author's brilliant and interesting style. His treatment of the Indians and their deeds hits the happy mean between sensationalism and tameness. Parkman has poetic sympathy and a high sense of color, both of which are needed in such a book as this, and not less in his records, in later works, of the struggles of early soldiers and missionaries in a crude and unsettled land. Braves and buffaloes, camps and hunts, aboriginal war and barbarian peace, virgin prairies and sky-piercing mountains, tangled forests and turbid streams, wild beasts and half-savage men struggling for the mastery—these things, which some foreign critics deem the only characteristic things in America, find a true and just chronicler in Francis Parkman. If the literature of travel could be given a lasting place in the world's choice of books, as in my opinion it cannot, these vivid chapters would not fail to make good their claim.

Akin to "The Oregon Trail" in its Indian theme and its descriptions of the far West, but rising to the dignity of history, is that work Pontiac and the Indian War. first published in 1851, and afterward greatly enlarged: "The Conspiracy of Pontiac, and the Indian War after the Conquest of Canada." Chronologically it follows the series hereafter to be mentioned, entitled France and England in North America; but in theme and treatment it may be read as an independent work, brought after its publication into general relation with kindred volumes. The title does not indicate, to the reader unfamiliar with the history of the American Indians, the importance of the work. The aboriginal tribes, or at least some of their more astute leaders, said that their hopes rested with the French rather than the English, and therefore sided with the former in the struggle for Canada, the prelude to the American revolution. This fact lay at the background of the events described by Mr. Parkman in these volumes. An historical situation of more than local or temporary importance, and a central figure upon which there rests the idea of romance and chivalric courage—these two things the historian likes to secure in the theme of which he writes; and both of them Parkman found. His ground, furthermore, was almost entirely unfamiliar, and his hero was of that sad race, compounded of good and evil in almost equal proportion, which preceded the English on American soil, and which never fails to arouse the interest of the reader of poetry, romance, or history. A comparison between Parkman and Cooper inevitably occurs to the reader of "The Conspiracy of Pontiac"; and the impression left upon the mind is that while Cooper used the novelist's privilege of selecting and retouching, he was substantially accurate in his pictures of Indian character. The facts stated by Parkman do not invalidate the fancies of Cooper. The true character of the aboriginal inhabitants, before they were corrupted and degraded by contact with the worse elements of "civilization," has been preserved for all time in the pages of Cooper, Parkman, and Longfellow; but Parkman, as the historian was bound to do, has introduced few colors of mere romance or idealism. The imaginative element, so essential to the historian, is, however, by no means lacking. Picturesqueness is the most conspicuous quality in Parkman's pages; and picturesqueness implies the ability to construct vivid pictures in the mind, and to transfer them to language without great loss of completeness or power.

Before passing to the series of histories under one title, the preparation of which has occupied the greater part of Parkman's literary life, and upon which his future reputation will chiefly rest, I pause to discuss, for a moment, a striking illustration, as afforded by the higher contemporary criticism of his books, of the difficulties of estimating the rank of a living writer. Such a discussion would be superfluous in a history of literature older than that of America; but it will display more clearly, perhaps, than any thing previously mentioned here, the necessity, and yet the seeming impossibility in many cases, of keeping an intense admiration in check until it be certain that time has justified its untrammelled expression. Without specifying the individual works which have elicited the commendation cited, one discovers, in the criticism devoted to Parkman's writings, such expressions as follow: "One of the most brilliant and fascinating books that has ever been written by any historian since the days of Herodotus." "His place is alongside of the greatest historians whose works are English classics." "Mr. Parkman, who, if Mr. Bancroft will forgive us for saying so, is the most eminent American historian now alive." "We know of no writer whose pages are so real and vivid in qualities harmonizing with his theme, as are his." "The events of the final struggle of France and England for the control of North America could not have found an historian more fitted for his task"; etc. I omit, of course, many equally glowing panegyrics from humbler critical sources, merely saying that those chosen as samples are from authorities supposed to be of the gravest and most cautious temper.* It is no wonder that more impressionable reviewers find his books "as fascinating as the best of Scott's novels," having a style "perfect for their purpose," "intensely interesting," and, indeed, "of incalculable value." How could it well be otherwise, since "magic hides itself in the brain and pen of Mr. Parkman," while "no poet, not even Homer himself, ever had a more romantic theme."† All this is concerning a writer whom the author of the only complete history (1886) of American literature—John Nichol—does not admit to his pages.

critic of contemporary literature endeavor to make his way, with a hundred voices chanting choruses of laudation in his ears. What historian of this century really deserves such praise as this? How many historians of any century, from Thucydides to Gibbon, deserve all the commendations here bestowed upon a single living writer? None knows better than Mr. Parkman himself that the critical pitch is tuned too high, and none would welcome more cordially any well-meant endeavor, however unsuccessful, to get a little nearer the truth. What are the real and lasting merits of Mr. Parkman's large achievement, in plan and in execution?

In the first place, the general subject chosen for the series, entitled "France and England in North America," was an excellent one. Touched by many writers, it had never been thoroughly and systematically treated by any. Mr. Parkman did not undertake to write a history of the United States, or Canada, or North America as a whole; but rather of the struggle of two great peoples, each with its special beliefs and customs, for the possession of the New World or of some of its most important parts. This subject lent itself admirably both to the picturesque treatment of what we may call the superficial historian and the analytical processes of the investigator into the philosophy of history. Or, in the author's own words, his aim was, "while scrupulously and rigorously adhering to the truth of facts, to animate them with the life of the past, and, so far as might be, clothe the skeleton with flesh. . . . Faithfulness to the truth of history involves far more than a research, however patient and scrupulous, into special facts. Such facts may be detailed with the most minute exactness, and yet the narrative, taken as a whole, may be unmeaning or untrue. The narrator must seek to imbue himself with the life and spirit of the time. He must study events in their bearings near and remote, in the character, habits, and manners of those who took part in them. He must himself be, as it were, a sharer or a spectator of the action he describes." Mr. Parkman, in other words, does not content himself with that dry specialism which, however valuable to the collector of materials for historical writing, does not adequately equip the historian. There can be no question that Mr. Parkman is both "patient and scrupulous" as a gatherer of documents, and a faithful and trustworthy sifter of truth from falsehood. But, in addition to this, he has been successful in the plan which he undertook, that of imbuing himself with the life and spirit of the time described. Given a fresh and attractive theme, a unity in itself, and yet subdivided into well-defined periods or episodes; and given, on the historian's part, industry and accuracy in the collation and study of authorities, together with a sympathetic spirit on the one hand and historic impartiality on the other, it is not difficult to see how critics have come to indulge in extravagant expressions of praise. When all needed deductions have been made from their too generous commendation, enough remains to entitle Mr. Parkman to a high place among the writers of his time.

His most conspicuous quality, and that by which,

I suppose, he will longest be kept in remembrance, is, as has been said, his picturesqueness. His points of view are well chosen, and from the selected stand-points he makes us see, with the eyes of a bystander at the time of action, the larger and the smaller deeds that are done. Word-painting for a purpose is not often better offered; hence, of course, it follows that Parkman is the most interesting of American historians, with the possible exception of Prescott, who is suffering at the present time from a comparative neglect that is not easily accounted for. This sort of graphic writing is found in the pages of Motley, plus an analytical power which neither Prescott nor Parkman possesses. But Motley can hardly be called a picturesque historian; at least, other adjectives more naturally and quickly occur to his readers, when they think of his literary method and achievement. For Prescott and Parkman, in their external style, and for Motley, in both style and strength, this may be said: that they fulfil excellently the proper demand that historical writing need not be dull—has no right to be dull. In giving to Motley credit for a strength greater than that of Prescott or Parkman, I would not imply that the latter are superficial; I mean that Motley leaves upon the mind of the reader the thought that an historian of such power in political analyzing might have shared and shaped the doings he describes.

The six parts of "France and England in North America," which had been published prior to 1886, were: "The Pioneers of France in the New World," "The Jesuits in North America in the Seventeenth Century," "La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West," "The Old Régime in Canada," "Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV.," and "Montcalm and Wolfe." The author aptly calls his undertaking "a series of historical narratives"; and the very titles show the union of a common purpose with individual characteristics. Of the whole series, the first volume is necessarily the most discursive; while at the other extreme stand "The Jesuits in North America," "The Old Régime in Canada," and "Montcalm and Wolfe," all of which are historical monographs of unusual completeness. The volume on the Jesuits, or the two volumes devoted to Montcalm and Wolfe, probably afford the most favorable means of familiarizing one's self with Parkman's manner. The names of Montcalm and Wolfe, says Mr. Parkman, "stand as representative of the two nations whose final contest for the control of North America is the subject of the book," which thus fitly concludes, for the present (one period yet remains to be covered), the general undertaking.

Parkman, it should be said, before we drop his name, is by no means destitute of power of broad historical statement, in which he is able to use a literary style not unlike that employed in his picturesque descriptions of battles or persons. No better citation could be made in illustration of this fact than the strong and forcible closing paragraphs of the second and final volume of "Montcalm and Wolfe":

All, and more than all, that France had lost, England had won. Now, for the first time, she was beyond dispute the greatest of maritime and colonial Powers. Portugal and Holland, her precursors in ocean enterprise, had long ago fallen hopelessly behind. Two great rivals remained, and she had humbled the one and swept the other from her path. Spain, with vast American possessions, was sinking into the decay which is one of the phenomena of modern history; while France, of late a most formidable competitor, had abandoned the contest in despair. England was mistress of the seas, and the world was thrown open to her merchants, explorers, and colonists. A few years after the Peace, the navigator Cook began his memorable series of voyages, and surveyed the strange and barbarous lands which after times were to transform into other Englands, vigorous children of this mother of nations. It is true that a heavy blow was soon to fall upon her; her own folly was to alienate the eldest and greatest of her offspring. But nothing could rob her of the glory of giving birth to the United States; and, though politically severed, this gigantic progeny were to be not the less a source of growth and prosperity to the parent that bore them—joined with her in a triple kinship of laws, language, and blood. The war, or series of wars, that ended with the Peace of Paris, secured the opportunities and set in action the forces that have planted English homes in every clime, and dotted the earth with English garrisons and posts of trade.

With the Peace of Paris ended the checkered story of New France; a story which would have been a history if faults of constitution and the bigotry and folly of rulers had not dwarfed it to an episode. Yet it is a noteworthy one in both its lights and its shadows: in the disinterested zeal of the founder of Quebec, the self-devotion of the early missionary martyrs, and the daring enterprise of explorers; in the spiritual and temporal vassalage from which the only escape was to the savagery of the wilderness; and in the swarming corruptions which were the natural result of an attempt to rule, by the absolute hand of a master beyond the Atlantic, a people bereft of every vestige of civil liberty. Civil liberty was given them by the British sword; but the conqueror left their religious system untouched, and through it they have imposed upon themselves a weight of ecclesiastical tutelage that finds few equals in the most Catholic countries of Europe. Such guardianship is not without certain advantages. When faithfully exercised it aids to uphold some of the tamer virtues, if that can be called a virtue which needs the constant presence of a sentinel to keep it from escaping; but it is fatal to mental robustness and moral courage; and if French Canada would fulfil its aspirations, it must cease to be one of the most priest-ridden communities of the modern world.

Scarcely were they free from the incubus of France when the British provinces showed symptoms of revolt. The measures on the part of the mother-country which roused their resentment, far from being oppressive, were less burdensome than the navigation laws to which they had long submitted; and they resisted taxation by Parliament simply because it was in principle opposed to their rights as freemen. They did not, like the American provinces of Spain at a later day, sunder themselves from a parent fallen into decrepitude; but with astonishing audacity they affronted the wrath of England in the hour of her triumph, forgot their jealousies and quarrels, joined hands in the common cause, fought, endured, and won. The disunited colonies became the United States. The string of discordant communities along the Atlantic coast has grown to a mighty people, joined in a union which the earthquake of civil war served only to compact and consolidate. Those who in the weakness of their dissensions needed help from England against the savage on their borders, have become a nation that may defy every foe but that most dangerous of all foes, herself; destined to a majestic future if she will shun the excess and perversion of the principles that made her great, prate less about the enemies of the present, resist the mob and the demagogue as she resisted parliament and king, rally her powers from the race for gold and the delirium of prosperity to make firm the foundations on which that prosperity rests, and turn some fair proportion of her vast mental forces to other objects than material progress and the game of party politics. She has turned the savage continent, peopled the solitude, gathered wealth untold, waxed potent, imposing, redoubtable; and now it remains for her to prove, if she can, that the rule of the masses is consistent with the highest growth of the individual; that democracy can give the world a civilization as mature and pregnant, ideas as energetic and vitalizing, and types of manhood as lofty and strong, as any of the systems which it boasts to supplant.

It is difficult for an American historian to avoid an American treatment of his theme. It was of course impossible for Mr. Parkman, at the conclusion of a history so closely connected with the birth of the new nation, to omit some philosophic reflections upon the origin and career of his own country.

In discussing the writings of William Hickling Prescott we turn aside from the soil of the United States, though not from that of North America and South America. Prescott was the author of histories of "The Conquest of Mexico" and "The Conquest of Peru," as well as of "The Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella," under whose auspices Columbus discovered the new world. These works, with his "History of Philip the Second" and his "Biographical and Critical Miscellanies," gave him a reputation brilliant and apparently solid in his lifetime, though it has unquestionably been obscured, in the quarter of a century since his death, by the weightier work of Bancroft and Motley, and by the writings of Parkman, which fairly rival those of Prescott in the matter of vivid and romantic delineation. "Brilliant" histories inevitably have to suffer in consequence of the speedy popularity they win: sometimes a harsh criticism of them appears during the lifetime of their authors; more often it slowly follows them after their authors' death. If Prescott were merely sensational and superficial, as most assuredly he is not, there would be no likelihood that his easily-won reputation would be maintained in any degree. But he chose for his themes historical periods and characters not discussed by previous writers at similar length; he equipped himself for his task by years of patient study; he gathered from European sources documents and data not before brought to light; and the results of his investigations he set before his readers in an attractive form. Without claiming that Prescott is an historian strictly of the highest class, we cannot avoid considering him in the company of Bancroft, Motley, and Parkman, his literary kinship being chiefly with the last. There is no special necessity why his subjects should be taken up for fresh treatment by other hands, for they have been faithfully and accurately portrayed by him. If this is the case, there would seem to be no reason why his colors, though gorgeous and sometimes laid on the canvas with an eye eager for effect, should jeopardize the favor accorded him by the reader.

The circumstances under which Prescott wrote were such as to promote great care in the matter of thought and expression. Because of a sad accident occurring in his college days, he was nearly blind for the rest of his working life, and was obliged to avail himself not only of the services of readers and private secretaries, but also of a "noctograph," or blind man's writing-machine. His industry, and his power of assimilation and classification of facts, went far to remove or minimize the difficulties under which he toiled. Prescott's mind was of a poetic and imaginative cast, and though he was not blind, he had much of the blind man's power to see single objects and broad fields of action by the inner light. The two American historians, Prescott and Parkman, who have been most widely known for their graphic and picturesque powers of description, have been the ones most trammelled in the use of physical sight. Both, fortunately, possessed the leisure and the means which made it possible for them to work patiently on, and their writings are trophies of victory won little by little.

Englishmen used to wonder at the early age at which Americans sought or achieved fame; but Prescott's studies and preparation were such as might have satisfied a Milton. He was forty years of age when he published his first work, his "History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, the Catholic." Ten solid years had been devoted to its composition, besides those spent in preliminary or kindred studies. Bancroft's first volume had appeared three years before ; Motley and Parkman were as yet unknown, and only Irving was a rival. The youthfulness of the literature of America is made clearly apparent when we reflect that only half a century has elapsed since the appearance of a complete historical treatise of a high class, written by an American, and accepted as a standard by European authorities. Prescott had chosen an attractive theme : Spain in her splendor at the time of the discovery of the New World. It was his policy to hunt for historical subjects, rather than to take those which forced themselves upon his attention. What shall be my occupation in life ? That of a man of letters. What sort of man of letters ? An historian. An historian of what ? Of the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella. This would not seem to be the best method of procedure ; but Prescott's leisure, possible and enforced, was greater than that which falls to the lot of most literary men. While he was not haunted, as most historians or poets or novelists have been, by an overmastering and ever-present idea, it cannot be denied that he deliberately chose the profession for which he was best fitted, and achieved in that profession the highest success which his powers made possible. He even overcame his physical disability, and it is unlikely that any more favorable circumstances would have worked results more considerable in quantity or more praiseworthy in quality.

The order of production of Prescott's works was as follows: "History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, the Catholic," 1837 ; "History of the Conquest of Mexico," 1843 ; "History of the

Prescott's Histories.

Conquest of Peru," 1847; "History of the Reign of Philip the Second," 1855-8. The last-named was left incomplete; to it is to be added an edition of Robertson's "Charles the Fifth," and a volume of miscellanies duly selected, in the Boston fashion of the day, from The North American Review. These works cannot be called "the romance of history," or "romantic history," if those terms leave upon the mind any sense of inaccuracy or haste, or any overweening desire to make a sensation or to color a picture. Prescott, with all his fervor and brilliancy, is, strictly speaking, less rhetorical in his methods than Macaulay. Mexico and Peru, with their gorgeous splendor and the decayed and forgotten magnificence of their civilization, were tempting themes, which, once chosen, could not have been made unattractive save by some Doctor Dryasdust. Prescott was no Dryasdust; he enjoyed his subjects and delighted in their portrayal; he did not disdain to moralize, like Macaulay with his "New Zealander," over dramatic situations and buried secrets; and he disbelieved in the theory that the duty of the historian is simply to set unadorned facts before the reader. He wrote history as his friend Everett wrote speeches; the oratorical and the historical methods of the "graceful" or "Athenian" Bostonians of 1830-1860 were substantially the same. The method would have been grotesquely unsuitable for some historical themes; Prescott's it suited admirably. It sometimes just missed being tawdry and verbose; "fine writing" is grandiose and wearisome. Prescott's gorgeous metaphors are occasionally mixed; and his flights of descriptive fancy sometimes become tiresome. He lacked Bancroft's reserve of nature and Motley's reserve of deliberate power. His chief ability lay in scenic portrayal. But he portrayed the whole scene, and in colors not soon to fade or be forgotten. His view was broad enough to include the whole time chosen, and all the events. He also effectively employed, at times, the method of historical contrast and parallel.

The biographer of Prescott, George Ticknor, gives a minutely detailed account * of the formation of Prescott's style. He returned, in mature years, to the study of grammar and rhetoric; he examined his own nature, with its faults and its merits; he insisted that the greatest charms of style must lie in its individualism and its representation or reflection of the character of the man himself; and he steadily refused merely to imitate masters of the writing art. But he wrote and rewrote with fastidious taste, until, in his later works, he was obliged, for the sake of the very results he sought, to give freer rein to his natural powers. He still based his writing, like his life, on minutely drawn rules and systems, but this later Puritanism was but a foundation for work, not an ascetic religion, as it had been two centuries before. Mr. Ticknor states that Prescott's personality went into his books, because of his infirmity of sight, whereby he was forced to ponder long and then to address his readers as it were with the voice and not the pen. The statement, doubtless correct, throws a strong light upon the pages of an historian with whom the word "style" must ever be connected. "His infirmity," says Mr. Ticknor, "was a controlling influence, and is to be counted among the secrets of a manner which has been found at once so simple and so charming. He was compelled to prepare every thing, down to the smallest details, in his memory, and to correct and fashion it all while it was still held there in silent suspense; after which he wrote it down, by means of his noctograph, in the freest and boldest manner, without any opportunity really to change the phraseology as he went along, and with little power to alter or modify it afterwards. This, I doubt not, was among the principal causes of the strength, as well as of the grace, ease, and attractiveness of his style. It gave a life, a freshness, a freedom, both to his thoughts and to his mode of expressing them. . . . He was able to carry what was equal to sixty pages of printed matter in his memory for many days, correcting and finishing its style as he walked or rode or drove for his daily exercise. In 1839, therefore, after going carefully over the whole ground, he said: 'My conclusion is, that the reader may take my style for better or for worse, as it now is.' And to this conclusion he wisely adhered. His manner became, perhaps, a little freer and easier, from continued practice, and from the confidence that success necessarily brings with it, but, in its essential elements and characteristics, it was never changed." *

the second volume of Mr. Justin Winsor's "Narrative and Critical History of America" (p. 426), is a striking and attractive portrait of the historian. His graceful figure, well-shaped head, delicate features, and gentle expression seem to have been caught by the artist. Prescott sits, writing with his "necrotograph," a far-away look in his half-sightless eyes, so that the general effect is both dignified and pitiful. Did ever a man of letters more bravely triumph over great odds? His serene character could be kindled by enthusiasm; and so in his histories we have the sober fidelity of fact, set forth with the glowing art of a romancer. More brilliant than Bancroft, as successful as Parkman in portraying historical episodes, his was the reputation likely to be most widespread in Europe, among all reputations achieved by American historians. In a time when critics are decrying rhetoric, however fine, and praising analysis, be it never so dull, the fame of Prescott is temporarily dimmed, but it cannot pass from sight until, if ever, it shall become necessary to rewrite the lives of Ferdinand and Isabella, and to tell anew the stories of the conquest of Mexico and the conquest of Peru.

Prescott's secretary, at one time, was John Foster Kirk, who, after Prescott's death, intelligently edited the last and standard ^{John Foster Kirk, b. 1824.} edition of the works of his master and friend. Mr. Kirk has a place among American historians by reason of his original work: he is the author of a three-volume "History of Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy," which is the fullest account of the last great Burgundian duke, and of his struggle with Louis XI. for the possession of Provence and for the erection of an independent Rhine kingdom to rival France. Kirk is like Prescott, in that he is thorough in his search for materials, and wisely chooses an important and comparatively unconsidered subject; among his faults is his too zealous attempt to "rewrite history" in Charles' favor, and to explain, at all hazards, the Duke's military failures. To this is to be added a prolixity hardly warranted by the subject selected, and an exclamatory rhetoric very different from the style of Prescott.

It is a pleasure to trace the history of certain divisions of American literature, not only because of the nature of the books discussed, but also on account of the personal character of the authors of those books. Closely connected with the writing is the writer; and if the writer has that individuality, that culture, and that strength and breadth of character which combine in Motley, the reader takes an increased satisfaction in the literary product. John Lothrop Motley was a notable example of that true culture which was developed on the cold and forbidding shores of New England two centuries after the Puritans founded a free American commonwealth. The American character was his, but that character, as in such lives as Prescott's, Longfellow's, or Lowell's, was developed by the study and personal knowledge of the intellectual treasures of Europe. Motley, in his later years, was the diplomatic representative of his country in two great European courts ; and thus honored the nation which has honored itself by sending so many of its authors as its political representatives abroad. In Europe he continued the prosecution of historical studies planned and begun at home ; there he was recognized as a true representative of his country's scholarship and literary ability ; and he shared in the important work which was continued between 1825 and 1875, the work of bringing European culture to America, and at the same time of carrying American culture to Europe. In this international exchange of intellectual benefits, both hemispheres have been gainers.

Motley, like Bancroft, Hildreth, and Parkman, began his literary career in other labors than those of an historian. But his novels, Motley's early writings. "Morton's Hope" and "Merry Mount," belong to a different and higher class of literature than that which includes Bancroft's poems, Hildreth's "Archy Moore," and Parkman's "Vassall Morton." Motley's "Merry Mount," an historical novel of the earliest days of New England, is in several ways a meritorious work. Without rapidity of movement or stirring interest, its quiet style is certainly not dull. Its representations of the grim Puritans and the jovial and aggravating Anglicans of Wollaston Heights, are faithful portraitures ; and we feel that we are instructed by an historian who is no special pleader on either side. The old hermit of Boston is a personage whom one remembers long after the book has been laid down. In scene, characterization, and accuracy of historical narration, "Merry Mount" was a fit precursor of the later and more important works of its author, devoted to other and higher subjects. The book has disappeared from notice, and it perhaps hardly deserves reprinting; but it showed the trend of the author's mind, and proved that a future success was at least possible for him.

It is not always profitable to trace, in minute detail, the progress of events in an author's life. He was born; he went to school or academy; he graduated at college, neglecting some studies and excelling in others; he essayed law or divinity, and grew wearied of it; travelled in Europe; married; contributed to the periodical press; occupied some public station; published his first book. Some such story as this could be told of half our American authors in the nineteenth century, and the filling in of details is comparatively unimportant, as a rule. The chief question that arouses our notice is, more properly, that which relates to an author's final adoption of a high literary life-work. John Lothrop Motley is known, the world over, as the great historian of the Netherlands. How came this to pass? Some know him as novelist, others are not aware that he ever wrote a novel. Some deem him a great diplomat, an honor to the nation, sacrificed to the ignorant spite of a president who could not appreciate him; others reply that his disagreement with an administration, and his friendship for Senator Sumner, when the latter was hostile to that administration, made necessary his removal from a confidential relation with the executive. Others, again, like to dwell upon his culture, his winsome personal character, his honorable career in the world of thought. Motley, the historian, however, claims our notice now, not Motley, the novelist, essayist, diplomat, man of culture. His life-work forced itself upon him. "I had not," he wrote to his friend Mr. William Amory, of Boston, Prescott's brother-in-law, "I had not first made up my mind to write a history, and then cast about to take up a subject. My subject had taken me up, drawn me on, and absorbed me into itself. It was necessary for me, it seemed, to write the book I had been thinking much of, even if it were destined to fall dead from the press, and I had no inclination or interest to write any other. . . . It was not that I cared about writing a history, but that I felt an inevitable impulse to write one particular history." *

This, clearly, was a noble beginning, and nobly was it followed. Motley's theme was of course closely akin to one upon which Prescott was already working, the "History of Philip the Second"; and the hearty welcome given the younger scholar by Prescott forms one of the pleasantest episodes in the personal experiences of American authorship. "The Rise of the Dutch Republic," thus begun, was written with the historian's painstaking care, after diligent study in the libraries and state-collections of Europe. It forms, in three volumes, the first part of a virtually connected history, of which the later instalments are "The History of the United Netherlands," in four volumes, and "The Life and Death of John of Barneveld, Advocate of Holland," in two volumes. The reader may separate these works for convenience' sake, but need not, for they are almost a united whole. As interesting as fiction, as eloquent as the best oratory, they are as trustworthy as accuracy and faithful industry could make them. Motley's portraiture of William the Silent is one of the great delineations of history. Not less able, nor less picturesque, is his remarkable account of the character of Queen Elizabeth of England, and of the court and times in which she lived. Writing of the Netherlands, Motley really gives us a military, civil, and social history of Europe in an age of great struggles. He has been accused of partiality and partisanship; but his analysis of the character of William is as just, and where there is need, as pitiless, as that of Philip II. himself. It has been declared that Motley is intensely anti-Catholic. Anti-Roman is the proper word; but his anti-Romanism is no more than a denunciation of the bloody horrors of the Inquisition, and of those awful wars in which the extermination of whole Protestant peoples was the perpetual purpose. The hate and cruelty of Calvinist against Romanist, and the hostilities between Calvinist and Lutheran, are laid bare to the eye of all future time. How Protestants persecuted and killed we are very plainly told by this impartial writer. Their crime was as great, in the moral sense, as that of their foes; but it hurried far fewer out of the world of terror and of blood. He who quarrels with Motley really quarrels with events, not with their recorder. His readers study under the guidance of a masterly political analyst, a writer whose style is vivid and eloquent, and an historian who can both gather facts and winnow truth from falsehood, and show a high appreciation of the spirit of liberty which moved great actions in stirring times. He was impulsive and occasionally haughty, as a man, and also in some of his judgments; but he was loyal to his idea of truth and freedom. "Stirring vitality" is the apt descriptive phrase applied to Motley by his friend and biographer; and it was this, with his intense love of religious and political freedom, which enabled him to give us "the long roll of glowing tapestry he has woven for us, with all its life-like portraits, its almost moving pageants, its sieges where we can see the artillery flashing, its battle-fields with their smoke and fire,—pictures which cannot fade, and which will preserve his name interwoven with their own enduring colors."*

The two greatest historians America has produced—Bancroft and Motley—were great because they were American historians, imbued with the national spirit of liberty.

Among living American historians and biographers who have selected foreign themes, the name of Eugene Schuyler demands attention, though his future literary career cannot be forecast. His two-volume "Life of Peter the Great"—as truly a history as a biography—is undoubtedly the standard life of the great Russian, even if we take into view the literature of the world. This position it has won by the fulness of its preliminary investigations, pursued during the diplomatic career which almost seems an inevitable element in the work of American historians; and also by the completeness of its plan and the minuteness and accuracy of its details. Its one fault is unfortunate, almost fatal. The book, which ought to have been interesting to the degree of romance, is dull from beginning to end. It is undoubtedly a magnum opus, but it must be read as a task, undertaken with resolution and completed with self-congratulation. Fortunate would Schuyler have been had he caught the charm of Motley's unpretending little essay on Peter, originally prepared as a review article, and long afterwards reprinted in a modest pamphlet.

This chapter on American historical writers may worthily be closed with a mention of the one great purely literary history thus far produced in the country. George Ticknor's "History of Spanish Literature" was the work of a man of broad and deep culture, trained in the best circles of his own country, and the friend and associate of many of the great Europeans of his day. The history, based upon long studies and patient accumulations of material, is consulted as the best, and, for the time, the ultimate, authority on its interesting theme. The highest tribute paid to its merit is the fact that, in our age of great critical authority, no contemporary scholar has undertaken to supplant it. Ticknor was fortunate in being able to treat of a body of literature which is great and also substantially complete; for the literary glory of Spain belongs, like that of Italy, to the past. In perspective, in justice of critical praise and blame, and in accuracy of statement, Ticknor's "History of Spanish Literature" is, in some respects, the best literary record devoted by a foreigner to the books of any country. Inferior to Taine's "English Literature" in brilliancy and beauty of style, it easily surpasses that most famous of recent criticisms in its candor and impartiality of thought and judgment and in its evenness of execution.

BORDERLANDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE.

LITERATURE, if strictly defined, cannot be said to include those books which have a purpose chiefly technical.

We must admit that literature has been enriched by some books not wholly ideal in aim, and not written for unpractical purposes. Thus, history and biography instruct; orations are delivered for the sake of clients or of governmental measures; philosophy and pedagogy are enshrined, perhaps, in an external adornment of literary style; theology is taught in books that belong to the choicest division of literature; prayers and creeds of noble verbal form seek the benefit, as well as the ideal pleasure, of the individual; and even poetry is didactic, moral, or devout. Literature, pure and simple, may both teach and preach; an English or American critic, at least, will not consent to divorce beauty from duty, though not denying that each may exist without the other.

But the critic and the reader must always remember that there are "books that are no The
of Science." books," in the literary sense. They may be useful, potent, indispensable; but they are not things of beauty that are joys forever ; their beauty is not its own excuse for being. Such, pre-eminently, are the majority of scientific books printed in this century of scientific progress. American thought has worked through its stages of religious propagandism, political liberation, and intellectual subserviency, to its own rights and achievements ; and among these achievements are many triumphs in scientific fields. Science, however, instinctively puts the matter before the manner, and is content to work in the borderlands of literature, neither making unwarrantable claims nor yielding to literature within the scientific province. It will not be expected that, in a survey of American literary growth, I shall discuss those scientific treatises which, farther removed than are theology and philosophy from the development of national literature, would demand review in a separate work, on a widely different plan.

The student of American intellectual history is not surprised to find that scientific investigation, in a country whose geography, geology, fauna, and flora were new to Europeans, antedated the rise of pure literature, and has not grown less important, up to the present time. The early scientific services of Benjamin Franklin have already been mentioned. They were shared by other Pennsylvanians, among whom American science was at first most encouraged and developed. John Bartram's botanical garden on the Schuylkill was known in Europe, and the warm-hearted Linnæus declared the plain Chester County Friend, "the greatest natural botanist in the world." David Rittenhouse, the modest maker of clocks and scientific instruments, was also a surveyor and mathematician, a physicist and astronomer, a doctor of laws, a fellow of the Royal Society, and Franklin's successor as president of the American Philosophical Society. This self-educated scientist also rose to a seat in the first constitutional convention of the State of Pennsylvania, and was afterward State Treasurer, and director of the national mint. Franklin was not the only scientific man in Pennsylvania who could win success in practical politics. Rittenhouse's eulogist, Benjamin Rush, who had been trained in the best medical schools of Europe, promoted the Revolution, signed the Declaration of Independence, labored as surgeon in the Revolutionary war, greatly furthered medical education in Philadelphia, which became the medical capital of the country, and concerned himself with the general scientific, social, and philanthropic welfare of his city and nation. Benjamin Thompson, a Massachusetts lad, having no more than an elementary training in local academies, went to England as a liberal Tory during the Revolution, fought on the British side in that war, in 1783 became a soldier in the Bavarian army, rose to high military, civil, and academic honors, performed for Bavaria many social services like those done for Pennsylvania by Franklin, and afterward, in Paris, London, and elsewhere, made important discoveries or experiments in the direction of modern physical investigation. Romance and beneficence united in his career, which, though cosmopolitan, was distinguished by an energy peculiarly American, and by an American conviction that science should be made practically and widely beneficial. Samuel Latham Mitchill, of the State of New York, studied medicine abroad, and law at home, favored and shared in the work of medical instruction in New York City, founded influential societies, and studied science to such advantage that his writings thereupon were esteemed in their day. It was no accident, but a result of the temper of American scientific thought, that Mitchill sat in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States. In Yale College, at the same time, the elder Silliman was working on lines similar to those of Mitchill in the neighboring State, and was developing geological, mineralogical, chemical, and physical pursuits, the results of which he made widely accessible by his popular lectures, and by his American Journal of Science and Arts.

These men were the pioneers of American science ; and their task was a harder one, in some ways, than that of our literary pioneers. After them other workers pushed farther, and achieved results more important, but not more creditable. Alexander Wilson began the study of native birds, and described them, in vivid language, in his "American Ornithology." The Louisianian Audubon took up the task where the Scotchman Wilson had left it, and offered, in his versatile President Woolsey, of Yale, whose writings, with an aptitude born of the needs of a new country, turn from Greek scholarship to political science, and from the intercourse of nations to matters of Bible revision. This intellectual alertness was observable in the varied works of Francis Lieber. Civil liberty and self-government were expounded by Lieber as by a Berlin-born Teuton who had changed his skies and thereby quickened his mind. What one writer has boldly called American political economy, set forth in the works of that staunch old protectionist, Carey, of Pennsylvania, itself demands, however unwisely, the extremest liberty, that of economic isolation. As, in the early days of America, clergymen sought to combine philosophy with religion, so President Wayland, of Brown University, Rhode Island, was a metaphysician who felt no rude jarring of subjects when he turned from moral science to political economy. These workers were often compelled to combine the duties of elementary instructors of their countrymen with those of original investigators ; but they bravely accepted the irksome task made necessary by their time and environment. With equal cheer was the same American necessity assumed by the geologist Hitchcock, president of Amherst College ; by James D. Dana, the chief of our living geologists ; and by Agassiz himself, doubtless the greatest name in the records of the geology and ichthyology of his adopted land. Guyot, Agassiz' fellow-countryman (both were of Swiss birth), did not hesitate to prepare elementary text-books for school use, though a physical geographer of competence in the higher scientific investigations. Asa Gray, the foremost American botanist, is the author of many text-books, some of them little more than primers. Since there is no question of the scientific standing, in more remote and abstruse investigations, of men like Dana and Gray and Agassiz, I cannot but deem their willingness to perform the drudgery of the elementary teacher, the text-book maker, or the popular lecturer, one potent cause of the rapid development of American science. They did it a service like that done to American culture by Longfellow in his early years, and they willingly adopted similar methods.

The same remark is applicable to several authors of books in the department of biblical archæology, a modern division of science in which American laborers have achieved honorable results. Edward Robinson, the pioneer in Palestine exploration ; Samuel C. Bartlett, the author of " From Egypt to Palestine " ; Henry Clay Trumbull, who established the location of the site of Kadesh-Barnea ; and others of equal learning, who have not as yet published volumes,—such men, content to forego literary rewards while working successfully on scholarly lines, have helped to solidify American thought, and to identify its labors with those of old-world savants in old-world fields. The significance of this new element in American intellectual progress is apparent.

Several of the men just named were college professors, busied in daily work in the class-room or laboratory, and devoting no more than their spare time to higher studies. The endowment of research is practically non-existent in America. Scientific thought has had to fight for a little leisure for broader work. In that leisure have been prepared Young's astronomical treatises; Cooke's "Religion and Chemistry"; Whitney's "Language and the Study of Language," "The Life and Growth of Language," and "Oriental and Linguistic Studies"; Hadley's Greek grammars and philological essays; Lewis' "The Bible and Science," and "Six Days of Creation." These books have no close relation with literature; but, whatever their scientific merits or demerits, they illustrate the diligence and self-sacrifice common in a growing department of American thought. The pressure upon the American educator is illustrated in the experience of Professor Hadley, who, devoting his life to Greek philology, found time for good occasional work in early English, and at last turned with most eager interest to the study of Roman law. This pressure endangers both health and scholarship; it cannot produce the best work; it departs in the day of the specialist; but, though perilous, it is stimulating. A great educator like Horace Mann left behind him no standard treatise on pedagogy, but a vitalizing influence in American schools. Literature got little from him; the nation much.

Nearer literature than the books of most of the scientists just named, are the writings of George Perkins Marsh, 1801-1882. G. P. Marsh, who first gave to America works on English philology of the higher class, and whose broad and deep scholarship could also turn to such a theme as "The Earth as Modified by Human Action." Of literary character, too, are the books of John William Draper, 1811-1882. John W. Draper, who wrote a dry history of the American civil war, and a weighty but unsympathetic "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe." And on the very borderland of literature stand four books with which I may close this catalogue, introduced for its significance, and not pretending or desiring to be complete. These four books, combining the accuracy of science with the ideality of literature, are Dr. Thomas Hill, b. 1818. Thomas Hill's "Geometry and Faith"; Professor Benjamin Peirce's "Ideality in the Physical Sciences"; and those works by an obscure and modest thinker, Elisha Mulford's "The Nation," and "The Republic of God." portant literatures of the world, nor is it so broad in its work. It strikes deep in certain places, but it has not yet explored all mines of thought. This much, however, may be said: it has become ^{American} established and has learned to submit to ^{literature} established. catholic estimates, not special estimates. Its borderlands are like those of other national literatures. A book attracts no notice because it is American. Theological writing, once so important, takes its own place, and does not, save in rare instances, ask to be measured by literary standards. Ethics is superadded to art, but does not claim to supplant art, or to be called art, so long as it rests on the ethical plane alone. Philosophy is studied as philosophy, not as a part of a preconceived theological scheme. It is theistic and optimistic, but not denominational or timid. History written by Americans succeeds or fails not because of its quaintness or flavor of the soil. American political writing is still eagerly read in Europe; our message to the world was never more seriously studied than now; but it is studied for the light it throws upon old-world problems, not for its revelations of an unfamiliar folk-character or a new idea of liberty. American science is no longer restricted to local investigations and descriptions. All along the line of work there is an international exchange of intellectual products. American literature no longer claims to be considered an "infant industry."

The last survival of the old idea, that something fresh and novel is to be sought in the United States is found in the current English and Continental idea of "American humor." Jesters and humorists of all degrees, from the coarse "parapher" of a far-western newspaper to Lowell himself, are popular on European railways and book-stalls. Crude and repulsive writing, sometimes adorned with appropriate pictures, is read with delight in parts of Europe, and deemed not only amusing but national, characteristic, representative. Before Lowell became so well known in England as a man of the broadest culture, he was regarded as no more than a dialect humorist. Bret Harte, Mark Twain, Artemus Ward, Nasby, and the various professional newspaper "wits" have been put, by the half-educated, into the representative seats that belong to Emerson or Hawthorne. The descendants of those who, as Irving said, were surprised to find an American with a quill in his hand and not on his head, now profess astonishment that America should make literary claims higher than those which can be advanced in behalf of "Innocents Abroad."

The wit and humor of Franklin, Irving, Holmes, Curtis, Lowell, Aldrich, and Bret Harte form an integral part of American literature, and, as such, are duly discussed in other parts of this work. Wit and humor, if genuine, can never be banished to the borderlands of literature. Chaucer and Molière are not less great because of their jests. But there is a class of authors ranking below Irving or Lowell, and lacking the higher artistic or moral purpose of the greater humorists, who amuse a generation and then pass from sight. Every period demands a new manner of jest, after the current fashion. Seventy-five years ago our great-grandfathers laughed at the jokes or satires of H. H. Brackinridge or Thomas Green Fessenden ; but the very names of Brackinridge's "Modern Chivalry" and Fessenden's "Terrible Tractoration" are forgotten. Then came Frederick S. Cozzens, with his "Sparrowgrass Papers," Judge Haliburton and "Sam Slick," "Q. K. Philander Doesticks," Lieutenant Derby and his "John Phoenix Papers," or Saxe, with his rapidly moving travesties and his easily rhyming puns. The civil war had its own set of humorists, now as far out of memory as the "sparkling" Willis of our sentimental period. The dialect and the semi-profane moralizing of Hay's poems are already passing into the shadows of oblivion, which have partially enveloped Leland's "Hans Breitmann" and Carleton's "Betsey." The reigning favorites of the day are Frank R. Stockton, Joel Chandler Harris, the various newspaper jokers, and "Mark Twain." But the creators of "Pomona" and "Rudder Grange," of "Uncle Remus and his Folklore Stories," and of "Innocents Abroad," clever as they are, must make hay while the sun shines. Twenty years hence, unless they chance to enshrine their wit in some higher literary achievement, their unknown successors will be the privileged comedians of the republic. Humor alone never gives its masters a place in literature ; it must coexist with literary qualities, and must usually be joined with such pathos as one finds in Lamb, Hood, Irving, or Holmes. As for wit, how many books can the critic find that live by reason of mere wit? Even the later English drama, opulent in wit, as it used to be thought, has left in current favor, to-day, but two comedies, or perhaps three. It may be that the salt in Hay's "Jim Bludso" and "Little Breeches," or Carleton's "Betsey and I are Out," will save for them some little place in the literature of the future; but one prophesies with hesitation in the case of poems like these, though they add pathos to humor and have a genuine flavor of the soil.

It is the flavor of the soil, in American humor, that explains its popularity in Europe. The flavor of the soil. It is deemed fresh, natural, and national; hence, it is read and enjoyed without much wish to distinguish between its higher and lower varieties, and without any deep interest in the question whether it be literature at all. All this is permissible and easy of explanation; but foreign readers and home producers must remember that temporary amusement, not literary product, is the thing sought and given.

Two or three divisions of American humor deserve somewhat more respectful treatment. Satire.

One of these is political satire, shown in its higher and keener form in Lowell's "Biglow Papers," and brought within the comprehension of all in the letters of "Petroleum V. Nasby." David Ross Locke, "Petroleum Vesuvius Nasby," b. 1833. The creator of "Nasby," selecting a coarse, vulgar, and selfish type of sot, surrounds him with rude personages and the environment of an illiterate village, and makes him the incarnation of the most ignorant, reactionary, and sordid elements in American politics. Nasby is backwoods preacher, "reformer," "workingman," postmaster, or chronic office-seeker, as the case demands. A "place" under government, a glass of whiskey, a clean shirt, and a dollar bill are luxuries he can obtain but seldom. His unblushing candor of rascality, and his unswerving fidelity to his simple principles of personal and political selfishness, make him a perennial figure in politics; so Nasby, in the shifting scenes since the war of 1861, has not become a wearisome or unprofitable figure. In him we see vicious and low political motives stripped of their pretences, and therefore we recognize a figure that points a moral as well as raises a laugh. Nasby, in a very different field, resembles Lowell in piercing to the heart of sham, and making that heart reveal its own baseness.

The same satirical purpose is occasionally perceptible in "Artemus Ward," an American humorist whose fame has at least lasted for a generation. Artemus is usually, however, a wit who amuses by his absurd and naïvely quiet surprises. "N. B.—Mr. Ward will pay no debts of his own contracting"—this line, on the show-bill of one of his humorous lectures, may stand as a sample of his whole method. This element of surprise is that which makes us laugh at his war-sayings, his panorama-descriptions, his reflections by the tomb of "William W. Shakespeare," and his kindly assertion that Chaucer was a great poet, but could n't spell; or even, at times, at his coarse and repulsive lectures on the "Mormons." Artemus Ward anticipated Mark Twain as a representative of calm American irreverence, ready to ridicule every thing not in a high degree sacred or lovable; but, like Mark Twain's, his lampoons were either made for the sake of fun alone, or for the ridicule of solemn pretence and hypocrisy. He is not the "characteristic American humorist," because there is no such thing as characteristic American humor. The English mind in its American home is alert and fond of puns, unexpected turns of thought, and the amusement caused by "a shock of surprise, produced by a falsehood plausibly pretending to be true, or by a truism pretending to be a novelty." * That is all.

One American humorist of later days, the late Henry W. Shaw, known by his pseudonym of "Josh Billings," reminds us of the homely common-sense which, always a characteristic of the better Saxons, was notably exemplified in the "Poor Richard" sayings of Franklin. Josh Billings, like Franklin, made almanacs; and though he used a pseudo-illiterate misspelling, and pretended to be jocose rather than seriously aphoristic, the philosophy of common-sense was never lost to view. Josh Billings, in such writings as his "Essay on the Muel," or parts of the rambling and oft-changed lecture on "Milk," could be as coarse as Artemus Ward,—or Thackeray at times; but we can forgive his coarseness for the sake of his wisdom, wit, and telling conciseness. Mere buffoonery is by no means his most conspicuous quality. His wit is above that which has been said to be "local and middle-class." Himself a man of the people, and of thoroughly rural and homespun life, he was both national and universal. A plain and jocose American's view of life,—that is what he gives us in his “wise saws and modern instances.” “With me,” he once said, “every thing must be put in two or three lines.” He could read his lectures backwards as well as forwards. He did not always raise a laugh, but he seldom failed to make a point. A London review, a few years ago, successfully tried the experiment of translating his proverbs into ordinary English, and claimed that their matter, without their manner, would give them a long life. Probably the review was wrong; the 127,000 annual copies of Josh Billings' “Farmer's Allminax” will become as rare as “Poor Richard's;” and his clever sayings, which miss being true literature, will remain on the borderland, and suffer from increasing neglect. But one finds something significant and hopeful, for literature itself, in the fact that from the midst of the plainest class of a hard-working and practical people can come a professional jester who can preach as well and as wittily as Josh Billings in such sayings as these :

Menny people spend their time trieing to find the hole whar sin got into the world—if two men brake through the ice into a mill-pond, they had better hunt for some good hole tew get out, rather than get into a long argument about the hole they cum to fall in.

The more learning a man acquires, the more suspishus he will be ov what he knows: “beware ov the man ov one book.”

Flattery iz like Kolone water, tew be smelt of, not swallowed.

If there iz a man more base than all others on God's footstool, it iz the one who will weaken yu over a bottle ov wine, and then take the advantage ov yu.

In this world thare is grate deal ov what is called virtew that iz nothing more than vice, tired out.

Reason was given us, not to prove what we kan't understand, but to rationally understand what we kan prove.

When Billings said: "Politeness haz won more viktorys than logick ever haz," he was simply putting into common phrase, for common people, Emerson's stanza on "Tact":

"What boots it, thy virtue,
What profit thy parts,
While one thing thou lackest,—
The art of all arts?"

And a whole farmer's gospel of Franklinian frugality and self-reliance was put into one capital quatrain printed in a "Farmer's Allminax":

He who by farmin wood git rich,
Must dig, and ho, and plant, and sich:
Work hard awl day, sleep hard awl nite,
Save evry cent, and not git tite.

As Billings himself once said: "Humor must be based on truth. It is because a thing is ludicrous and at the same time true to nature that people laugh at it. Now, Artemus Ward was not a humorist, but he was the drollest man the country has ever produced. Writers who make their effects by hyperbole are not humorists. Genuine humor lasts forever, because it is true."

Here I must bring to a close this discussion of the development of American prose literature, with the exception of the department of fiction, which is reserved, with that of poetry, for consideration in a second and concluding volume. If any part of that literature shall last forever, it will be because it is true—true in thought and in art. It may be that even the better books which compose what we now call American literature will prove but the beginning of a greater future. The critic and the reader, perhaps, have thus far traced but a few footpaths across the borderland of the national literature of the times to come.

The steep be graded,
The mountain tunnelled,
The sand shaded,
The orchard planted,
The globe tilled,
The prairie granted,
The steamer built.

Let man serve law for man ;
Live for friendship, live for love,
For truth's and harmony's behoof ;
The state may follow how it can,
As Olympus follows Jove.

Yet do not I implore
The wrinkled shopman to my sounding woods.
Nor bid the unwilling senator
Ask votes of thrushes in the solitudes.
Every one to his chosen work ;—
Foolish hands may mix and mar ;
Wise and sure the issues are.
Round they roll till dark is light,
Sex to sex, and even to odd ;—
The over-god

Who marries Right to Might,
Who peoples, unpeoples ;—
He who exterminates Races by stronger races,
Black by white faces,—
Knows to bring honey
Out of the lion ;
Grafts gentlest scion
On pirate and Turk.

The Cossack eats Poland,
Like stolen fruit ;
Her last noble is ruined,
Her last poet mute :
Straight, into double band
The victors divide ;
Half for freedom strike and stand ;—
The astonished Muse finds thousands at her side.”

"It is an exceedingly interesting work, and a thorough and complete history of the Western border."—Minneapolis Tribune.

"It treats of a subject that has never yet been dealt with in a thorough-going fashion, or with a full appreciation of its high importance."—Phila. Telegraph.

"Written in a free and flowing style, always graceful, but never turgid, that makes the narrative delightful reading from the first page to the end."—Chicago Times.

"Has had the advantage of much hitherto unused material, and has made painstaking, and evidently successful, efforts to render his history accurate as well as enjoyable."—Congregationalist.

"For the first time the whole field has been covered in one work by one accomplished and thoroughly equipped writer, whose book will rank among American historical writings of the first order."—The Critic, New York.

"There is no one who could have described Indian warfare and frontier life with more spirit or more sympathy than Mr. Roosevelt. From beginning to end these volumes are interesting. Yet the quality of interest which the narrative possesses in such a pre-eminent degree does not give to it its only value. The historical reflections are numerous, original, and sensible."—Christian Union.

"It will at once take rank among the most important books of its class that have been produced in this country."—Chicago Journal.

FRANCE UNDER RICHELIEU AND MAZARIN.

A History of France under Mazarin, with a Review of the Administration of Richelieu. By James Breck Perkins. 2 vols., octavo, with four portraits . . . $5 00

"It is refreshing to find an historic work which appears to be written in a calm, judicial spirit, in which there is no disposition, on the one hand, to glorify, or, on the other, to damn Richelieu, or anybody else, merely because he did not subscribe to the same creed to which the historian adheres. It is scarcely, if at all, possible to tell whether Mr. Perkins is a Romanist, Protestant, or Agnostic, and it is immensely to his credit, as an historian, that such is the case. It is possible that time may show the estimate of this work to be too high; but it certainly seems to rank with the best work of Motley, or Lecky, or Macaulay in the field of history. It is superior to either in its absolute impartiality, and in evidence of close, unsparing research; and equal to either in a certain sustained dignity and manly directness of style, qualities which seem peculiarly apt in the historian. . . . This notice has already extended beyond reasonable limits. The excuse therefor must be found in the admirable character of Mr. Perkins' work, its comprehensive scope, the industry which has gone to sources of information scarcely known to the historians who have treated the period,—or, if known, practically disregarded,—the fairness of its spirit, the easy dignity of its style, and the perfect confidence with which it threads its way among the tortuous intrigues and cabals of the period."—Chicago Times.

"His book defines more lucidly and precisely than any other English work with which we are acquainted how much the Minister of Louis XIII. found already done and how much he left undone. Mr. Perkins' account of France under the Cardinals is a vigorous and cogent rehabilitation of Mazarin. . . . Here we touch the novel and most instructive results of Mr. Perkins' researches, and he was well counselled in assigning much the larger part of his two volumes to this section of his theme. . . . Fortunate indeed would Germany and the House of Hohenzollern be, if Bismarck might count on a successor such as Mr. Perkins, first among English students of the epoch, has disclosed to us in Mazarin."—N. Y. Sun.

"The genuine student of history will hail these volumes with delight. It is safe to say that English readers for the first time have a luminous, impartial, exceedingly well-written history of the first half of the seventeenth century in France. . . . The history of the administration of the adroit Jules Mazarin is told in a way to excite an interest which one feels while reading Macaulay. Mr. Perkins has the gift of stating what in other hands would be dry details in a most interesting manner. The chapter on "Social Life and Customs" has all the interest of a romance."—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

"Summarizing thus some of the principal features of Mr. Perkins' brilliant work, it will be discovered that his labors have been conducted with a degree of patience, intelligence, and thoughtfulness which will make his history successful. The work of Mr. Perkins has an intrinsic value seldom acquired by historians of the French."—St. Louis Republican.

WITH EXTRACTS FROM HIS WORKS AND SOME HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED POEMS.

OCTAVO, WITH PORTRAIT ON STEEL, AND FAC-SIMILE OF PORTION OF

CLOTH EXTRA, GILT TOP, $2.50.

"The author of the 'Columbiad' and the 'Hasty Pudding' was a man of might in his day, and will not pass out of literature or history."—E. C. STEDMAN.

"The great men of the post-Revolutionary age were not, as a rule, versatile. Their development was largely in one direction—statesmanship. Jefferson, it is true, shone both, as a statesman and a philosopher; so did Franklin: but it would be difficult to carry the parallel further. There was one, however, among this group of worthies who excelled in at least three great departments of human effort—in statesmanship, letters, and philosophy,—and whose practical talents were perhaps greater than those of any of his contemporaries. That man was Joel Barlow, the subject of these pages. His verse first gave American poetry a standing abroad. His prose writing contributed largely to the triumph of Republicanism in 1800. He was the first American cosmopolite, and twice made use of his position to avert from his country a threatened foreign war. He was the godfather of the steamboat and canal, and sponsor with Jefferson of our national system of internal improvements."—Extract from Preface.

"The 'Life of Joel Barlow' is a welcome addition to our historical literature . . . A very real debt of gratitude is due Mr. Todd for a spirited biography and for chosen selections from the interesting material at his disposal."—Atlantic Monthly.

"Mr. Todd's elaborate work is full of interest at all points, and to most readers it will prove as instructive as it is interesting."—Hartford Times.

"Mr. Todd has made the most of a career which was marked by a good deal of vicissitude, and was by no means lacking in romantic incident."—Book-Buyer.

OF THE THIRTY YEARS' WAR.

By ANTON GINDELY,
PROFESSOR OF GERMAN HISTORY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PRAGUE.

TRANSLATED BY ANDREW TEN BROOK,
RECENTLY PROFESSOR OF MENTAL PHILOSOPHY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

SECOND EDITION. TWO VOLUMES, OCTAVO, WITH MAPS AND ILLUSTRATIONS. $4.00.

This most important period of European History, a right understanding of which is essential to the proper comprehension of Europe to-day, has long waited for an historian. The work of Schiller, while thoroughly readable, was written without any special historical preparation, and at a time when the collections of government archives were not accessible. The little handbook of Gardiner is a most admirable summary, but is too condensed for general reading. It is believed that the present work, which has been prepared by an historian of the highest position and authority, and while thoroughly trustworthy for the purposes of the scholar, is full of interest for the general reader, will meet all the requirements, and will remain the authority on the subject.

“The translator has not only performed his task in a masterly manner, but by his presentation of this admirable work to English readers, has placed them under a debt of obligation.”—Portland Press.

“Prof. Gindely has achieved true success in the historical line; he has a real genius for such labors.”—Post, Hartford.
